

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

MEEETING OF THE PARLIAMENT—THE PARLIAMENT OPENED BY COMMISSION 1

His Royal Highness Albert Edward, The Prince of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, having been created Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester, was introduced (with much ceremonial), and standing at the Table, the Letters Patent and Writ were read by the Clerk of the Parliaments, and His Royal Highness took and subscribed the Oath; after which His Royal Highness was conducted to his Chair on the right hand of the Throne 1

Speech of the Lords Commissioners delivered as follows:— .. 3

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"Her Majesty commands us to inform you that since you were last assembled She has declared Her Consent to a Marriage between His Royal Highness The Prince of Wales and Her Royal Highness The Princess Alexandra, Daughter of Prince Christian of Denmark; and Her Majesty has concluded thereupon a Treaty with The King of Denmark, which will be laid before you.

"The constant Proofs which Her Majesty has received of your Attachment to Her Person and Family persuade Her that you will participate in Her Sentiments on an Event so interesting to Her Majesty, and which, with the Blessing of God, will, She trusts, prove so conducive to the Happiness of Her Family, and to the Welfare of Her People.

"Her Majesty doubts not that you will enable Her to make Provision for such an Establishment as you may think suitable to the Rank and Dignity of the Heir Apparent to the Crown of these Realms.

"A Revolution having taken place in Greece, by which the Throne of that Kingdom has become vacant, the Greek Nation have expressed the strongest Desire that Her Majesty's Son, Prince Alfred, should accept the Greek Crown. This unsolicited and spontaneous Manifestation of Goodwill towards Her Majesty and

Her Family, and of a due Appreciation of the Benefits conferred by the Principles and Practice of the British Constitution, could not fail to be highly gratifying, and has been deeply felt by Her Majesty.

"But the Diplomatic Engagements of Her Majesty's Crown, together with other weighty Considerations, have prevented Her Majesty from yielding to this general Wish of the Greek Nation.

"Her Majesty trusts, however, that the same Principles of Choice which led the Greek Nation to direct their Thoughts, in the first instance, towards His Royal Highness Prince Alfred, may guide them to the Selection of a Sovereign under whose Sway the Kingdom of Greece may enjoy the Blessings of internal Prosperity and of peaceful Relations with other States; and if in such a State of Things the Republic of the Seven Islands should declare a deliberate Wish to be united to the Kingdom of Greece, Her Majesty would be prepared to take such Steps as may be necessary for the Revision of the Treaty of November 1815, by which that Republic was reconstituted and was placed under the Protection of the British Crown.

"Her Majesty's Relations with Foreign Powers continue to be friendly and satisfactory.

"Her Majesty has abstained from taking any Step with a view to induce a Cessation of the Conflict between the contending Parties in the North American States, because it has not yet seemed to Her Majesty that any such Overtures could be attended with a Probability of Success.

"Her Majesty has viewed with the deepest Concern the desolating Warfare which still rages in those Regions; and She has witnessed with heartfelt Grief the severe Distress and Suffering which that War has inflicted upon a large Class of Her Majesty's Subjects, but which have been borne by them with noble Fortitude and with exemplary Resignation. It is some Consolation to Her Majesty to be led to hope that this Suffering and this Distress are rather diminishing than increasing, and that some Revival of Employment is beginning to take place in the manufacturing Districts.

"It has been most gratifying to Her Majesty to witness the abundant Generosity with which all classes of Her Subjects in all Parts of Her Empire have contributed to relieve the Wants of their suffering Fellow Countrymen; and the Liberality with which Her Majesty's Colonial Subjects have on this Occasion given their Aid has proved that, although their Dwelling Places are far away, their Hearts are still warm with unabated Affection for the Land of their Fathers.

"The Relief Committees have superintended with constant and laborious Attention the Distribution of the Funds intrusted to their Charge.

"Her Majesty commands us to inform you that She has concluded with The King of the Belgians a Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, and a Convention respecting Joint Stock Companies. That Treaty and that Convention will be laid before you.

"Her Majesty has likewise given Directions that there shall be laid before you Papers relating to the Affairs of Italy, of Greece, and of Denmark, and that Papers shall also be laid before you relating to Occurrences which have lately taken place in Japan.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"Her Majesty has directed that the Estimates for the ensuing Year shall be laid before you. They have been prepared with a due Regard to Economy, and will provide for such Reductions of Expenditure as have appeared to be consistent with the proper Efficiency of the Public Service.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"We are commanded by Her Majesty to inform you that, notwithstanding the Continuance of the Civil War in North America, the general Commerce of the Country during the past Year has not sensibly diminished.

"The Treaty of Commerce which Her Majesty concluded with The Emperor of the French has already been productive of Results highly advantageous to both the Nations to which it applies; and the general State of the Revenue, notwithstanding many unfavourable Circumstances, has not been unsatisfactory.

"Her Majesty trusts that these Results may be taken as Proofs that the productive Resources of the Country are unimpaired.

"It has been gratifying to Her Majesty to observe the Spirit of Order which happily prevails throughout Her Dominions, and which is so essential an Element in the Well-being and Prosperity of Nations.

"Various Measures of public Usefulness and Improvement will be submitted for your Consideration; and Her Majesty fervently prays that in all your Deliberations the Blessing of Almighty God may guide your Councils to the Promotion of the Welfare and Happiness of Her People."

SUPPLY—Order for Committee read; Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”
AFFAIRS OF POLAND—Amendment proposed,
To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to represent to Her Majesty that certain Treaty obligations have been incurred by England and other Powers with Russia in respect to Poland, and that these Treaty obligations have not been fulfilled by Russia, but were (in the words of Her Majesty’s present First Minister) broken almost as soon as concluded :
That these joint obligations are set forth in the first fourteen Articles of the Treaty of Vienna, and that the Emperor of Russia, on the 18th day of May 1815, thus recapitulated them : ‘ A Constitution ; the preservation in public enactments of the Polish language ; the restriction of public appointments to Poles ; freedom of Commerce ; and a national army ; and subsequently the same Sovereign, addressing the Poles, said, ‘ Your restoration is defined by solemn Treaties. It is sanctioned by the Constitutional Chart. The inviolability of these external engagements and of that fundamental law ensures for Poland henceforth an honourable place among European Nations :’
That for many years past not one of these engagements and conditions has been fulfilled :
That it appears from the diplomatic documents which from time to time have been laid before Parliament, that these external engagements of Russia in respect to Poland were avowedly intended by the contracting parties, on the one hand, as a compensation for the loss of her independence by the dismemberment, and, on the other hand, as guarantees for the peace and security of Europe :
That the breach of the solemn engagements thus incurred between England and Russia has recently been described (2nd July 1861) by Her Majesty’s First Minister in his place in this House, in the following words :—
‘ The course which the Government of Russia adopted towards Poland was a complete and decided violation of the Treaties of Vienna. The stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna were broken almost as soon as concluded. Perhaps the greatest violation of a Treaty that has ever taken place in the history of the world was that which occurred in the case of Poland :’
That for years past the Poles have borne with exemplary patience this deliberate violation of their national rights :
That whilst their endurance has attracted the admiration of Europe, it seems to have aroused the worst passions of the Russian authorities :
That the patriotic self-restraint of the unanimous people of Poland has at length given way under an accumulation of outrages unparalleled in these times :
That the Kingdom of Poland is now the scene of desolating conflicts between the troops of Russia and the people thus driven to desperation :
Humbly to submit to Her Majesty that these facts demand the interposition of England in vindication of her own public faith and solemn engagements,”—(Mr. Hennessey),—instead thereof.
Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”	879
After long Debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn .
THE IONIAN ISLANDS—Observations, Lord William Graham; Reply, Sir George Lewis	943
Main Question put, and agreed to .

ROLL OF THE LORDS SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL

KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

26^o VICTORIÆ, 1863.

MEM.—According to the Usage of Parliament, when the House appoints a Select Committee, the Lords appointed to serve upon it are named in the Order of their Rank, beginning with the Highest; and so, when the House sends a Committee to a Conference with the Commons, the Lord Highest in Rank is called first, and the rest go forth in like Order: But when the Whole House is called over for any Purpose within the House, or for the Purpose of proceeding forth to Westminster Hall, or upon any public Solemnity, the Call begins invariably with the Junior Baron.

THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS' SPEECH.

THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS—namely, The LORD CHANCELLOR, The LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Duke of Argyll), The LORD STEWARD of the HOUSEHOLD (the Earl of St. Germans), The LORD CHAMBERLAIN of the HOUSEHOLD (the Viscount Sydney), The LORD STANLEY of ALDERLEY (Postmaster General)—being in their Robes, and seated on a form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack, commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to signify to the Commons "The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate attendance in this House."

Who being come, with their Speaker;

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in pursuance of Her Majesty's Commands, delivered the Speech of THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS to both Houses of Parliament, as follows:—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"Her Majesty commands us to inform you that since you were last assembled She has declared Her Consent to a Marriage between His Royal Highness The Prince of Wales and Her Royal Highness The Princess Alexandra, Daughter of Prince Christian of Denmark; and Her Majesty has concluded thereupon a Treaty with The King of Denmark, which will be laid before you.

"THE constant Proofs which Her Majesty has received of your Attachment to Her Person and Family persuade Her that you will participate in Her Sentiments on an Event so interesting to Her Majesty, and which, with the Blessing of God, will, She trusts, prove so conducive to the Happiness of Her Family, and to the Welfare of Her People.

"HER Majesty doubts not that you will enable Her to make Provision for such an Establishment as you may think suitable to the Rank and Dignity of the Heir Apparent to the Crown of these Realms.

"A REVOLUTION having taken place in Greece, by which the Throne of that Kingdom has become vacant, the Greek Nation have expressed the strongest Desire that Her Majesty's Son, Prince Alfred, should accept the Greek Crown. This unsolicited and spontaneous Manifestation of Goodwill towards Her Majesty and Her Family, and of a due Appreciation of the Benefits conferred by the Principles and Practice of the British Constitution, could not fail to be highly gratifying, and has been deeply felt by Her Majesty.

"BUT the Diplomatic Engagements of Her Majesty's Crown, together with other weighty Considerations, have prevented Her Majesty from yielding to this general Wish of the Greek Nation.

"HER Majesty trusts, however, that the same Principles of Choice which led the Greek Nation to direct their Thoughts, in the first instance, towards His Royal Highness Prince Alfred, may guide them to the Selection of a Sovereign under whose Sway the Kingdom of Greece may enjoy the Blessings of internal Prosperity and of peaceful Relations with other States; and if in such a State of Things the Republic of the Seven Islands should declare a deliberate Wish to be united to the Kingdom of Greece, Her Majesty would be prepared to take such Steps as may be necessary for a Revision of the Treaty of November 1815, by which that Republic was reconstituted, and was placed under the Protection of the British Crown.

"HER Majesty's Relations with Foreign Powers continue to be friendly and satisfactory.

"HER Majesty has abstained from taking any Step with a view to induce a Cessation of the Conflict between the contending Parties in the North American States, because it has not yet seemed to Her Majesty that any such Overtures could be attended with a Probability of Success.

"HER Majesty has viewed with the deepest Concern the desolating Warfare which still rages in those Regions; and She has witnessed with heartfelt Grief the severe Distress and Suffering which that War has inflicted upon a large Class of Her Majesty's Subjects, but which have been borne by them with noble Fortitude and with exemplary Resignation. It is some Consolation to Her Majesty to be led to hope that this Suffering and this Distress are rather diminishing than increasing, and that some Revival of Employment is beginning to take place in the manufacturing Districts.

"IT has been most gratifying to Her Majesty to witness the abundant Generosity with which all Classes of Her Subjects in all Parts of Her Empire have contributed to relieve the Wants of their suffering Fellow Countrymen; and the Liberality with which Her Majesty's Colonial Subjects have on this Occasion given their Aid has proved that, although their Dwelling Places are far away, their Hearts are still warm with unabated Affection for the Land of their Fathers.

"THE Relief Committees have superintended with constant and laborious Attention the Distribution of the Funds intrusted to their Charge.

"HER Majesty commands us to inform you that She has concluded with The King of the Belgians a Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, and a Convention respecting Joint Stock Companies. That Treaty and that Convention will be laid before you.

"HER Majesty has likewise given Directions that there shall be laid before you Papers relating to the Affairs of Italy, of Greece, and of Denmark, and that Papers shall also be laid before you relating to Occurrences which have lately taken place in Japan.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"HER Majesty has directed that the Estimates for the ensuing Year shall be laid before you. They have been prepared with a due Regard to Economy, and will provide for such Reductions of Expenditure as have appeared to be consistent with the proper Efficiency of the Public Service.

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"WE are commanded by Her Majesty to inform you that, notwithstanding the Continuance of the Civil War in North America, the general Commerce of the Country during the past Year has not sensibly diminished.

"THE Treaty of Commerce which Her Majesty concluded with The Emperor of the French has already been productive of Results highly advantageous to both the Nations to which it applies; and the general State of the Revenue, notwithstanding many unfavourable Circumstances, has not been unsatisfactory.

"HER Majesty trusts that these Results may be taken as Proofs that the productive Resources of the Country are unimpaired.

"It has been gratifying to Her Majesty to observe the Spirit of Order which happily prevails throughout Her Dominions, and which is so essential an Element in the Well-being and Prosperity of Nations.

"VARIOUS Measures of public Usefulness and Improvement will be submitted for your Consideration; and Her Majesty fervently prays that in all your Deliberations the Blessing of Almighty God may guide your Counsels to the Promotion of the Welfare and Happiness of Her People."

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure.

House resumed.

The LORDS COMMISSIONERS' Speech having been reported by The LORD CHANCELLOR,

THE EARL OF DUDLEY said: My Lords, I rise to move an Address to Her Majesty in answer to Her gracious Speech. In doing so I am relieved from much of that anxiety which has frequently attached to persons who have undertaken the same duty, by the knowledge that many of the propositions contained in the Address will meet with your Lordships' unanimous approval. Upon this occasion, my Lords, I cannot but express my regret that the Speech to which we are about to reply has been delivered, necessarily, through Commissioners, and not by her Majesty in Person; for it has thereby lost the great charm which your Lordships have so often experienced when the Speech has been delivered from the Throne by Her Majesty personally, and which I trust your Lordships will again experience in many future years.

My Lords, the first point in Her Majesty's Speech to which I will refer is one possessing the greatest possible interest for Her Majesty herself, for the Prince of Wales, and for the nation at large. It is of the deepest interest to our Sovereign, because across that cloud which has overshadowed the Royal circle it will throw some rays of light, which I trust will diffuse themselves around until they have dissipated the gloom in that chamber of sorrow, leaving but one dark corner withdrawn from public gaze in which one name, one idea, must ever remain veiled. I turn from this grave subject, my Lords, to say that there can be no more pleasing duty to your Lordships than to receive among you the future Sovereign of these realms, and to welcome that illustrious Prince to his seat among the Peers of England, and the more especially so as the Sovereign has just made known to us that an act the most important to his future life has been determined on; and we are therefore enabled to express publicly our warmest hopes for his future happiness in an event which has hitherto been only the subject of rumour. Your Lordships, I am sure, all trust that many years will elapse before the Prince of Wales shall be called upon to take the highest position in the State; but we may hope that his Royal Highness, in the step he is taking, is about to enter upon a course of domestic happiness, of far more real importance to his future welfare. And if for the attainment of that happiness the most careful training, received with filial obedience, of intelligence and mental power, whereby such training could be fully developed, can prepare a Prince for such a future as seems to be before His Royal Highness, and for so fair a Crown as awaits him, then can no one be more justly envied in every respect, both public and private, than the Prince of Wales, whom I have the honour of addressing. I may even go a step further, and touching upon more personal and delicate ground, I may express a hope that His Royal Highness in his married life may enjoy all the advantages which those less gifted in respect of position or power derive in the struggles and trials of life from a perfect understanding between man and wife. To the advantages already enjoyed by him the Prince has been able to superadd another, that among the limited number of Princesses with whom it was possible for him to form an alliance, he has found one in whom not only beauty, elegance, accomplishments, and high training are united, but who possesses that necessary element of union and happiness in domestic life, the same feeling in regard to religion. I may indeed say, that if there be any ground for the common belief that marriages are not designed upon earth, it may be fairly inferred that the marriage about to be contracted by our future Sovereign is of Diviner origin.

From that subject I will pass to another, with which the country at large is more particularly interested, although the interest of the Sovereign is a direct and personal one in it, for it cannot be otherwise than a source of gratification to our Queen in her retirement to find that the training which her children have received has been such that a foreign nation seeking for a Sovereign was prepared to accept for their King one of her sons, a

Prince only just verging into manhood, and consequently quite inexperienced, but who by faith in his education and training was deemed qualified to occupy the important position that has been offered to him. That it should not have been possible to accept the offer of the Kingdom of Greece, in consequence of existing diplomatic engagements, is only saying that England, however flattering an offer might be, would not hesitate to decline it when contrary to the faith of treaties. Had it been otherwise, and had it been possible to comply with the wish of the Greek nation, it might have been a great advantage to Greece; but as opposed to diplomatic engagements, it has necessarily been declined. The mention of Greece naturally leads me to refer to the proposition which, however startling it may at first sight appear, has actually been made—namely, that the Ionian Islands shall be ceded to the future Constitutional Sovereign of Greece, whoever he may happen to be. I have no doubt, when that proposal was heard for the first time, it may have been regarded as a proposal to hand over some portion of Her Majesty's dominions to another Power. But that is not so. I need scarcely state, in your Lordships' House, that it is only as Protectors under special treaties that we stand in any relation to those Islands; and if with due regard to their future these Islands can be given up, it will speak highly for the days in which we live, that without detriment to England from the transference, they can be safely handed over to the new Sovereign of Greece. It is, I must say, a matter of almost painful curiosity to know how the problem of who shall fill the throne of Greece is to be solved; but I cannot help thinking, that if Greece were true to herself, there must within her own realm be found one capable of taking charge of her national interests; and if the natural jealousies which attend the setting up a Royal House were once over, one holding the same religion and speaking the same language as the Greeks themselves would have a far better chance of ruling with power and dignity than any foreign Prince, come from what quarter he may. My Lords, the Royal Speech informs us on this occasion, as we have happily been informed on many previous occasions, that "Her Majesty's relations with Foreign Powers continue to be friendly and satisfactory."

Our earnest desire must be that they shall so continue. It is of the greatest consequence to the country that it should be so, for it is to that friendship more than to our armies and navies that we look for the peace of the world. In one quarter that peace, unfortunately, has been broken, and Her Majesty declares that she "has abstained from taking any steps with a view to induce a cessation of the conflict between the contending parties in the North American States, because it has not yet seemed to Her Majesty that any such overtures could be attended with a probability of success." In my opinion, the proposal which was made to Her Majesty's Government to intervene in order to bring to an end the civil conflict in America has been most rightly rejected, inasmuch as any proposition of that sort must have fallen uselessly to the ground from the temper which at that time prevailed on both sides in America; and I cannot say that even since that offer was rejected any great change towards a better state of sentiment and feeling has occurred, so as to afford any likelihood of bringing the two parties together. It must not, however, for a single moment be supposed that it is not for the interest of this country that that war should cease. Putting humanity out of the question altogether, and speaking of the interests of this country merely commercially, we cannot look to the distress existing in these realms, and know how to a great extent the cessation of that war would cause that suffering to cease, without an earnest desire that the present unfortunate contest in America should be brought to a close. But I do think—especially looking to the feelings which were created by our declaration that we would adhere to a course of strict neutrality between the parties—that anything we can do is more likely to embitter than allay the bitter animosity which at present seems to exist towards this country. Why such a hostile feeling should exist I do not know, for in all truth and honesty our neutrality has been a real one. It may perhaps be natural that both sides should be disappointed by the course we have determined to pursue; for both sides—both the North and South—have made efforts to induce us to a breach of our declared neutrality, and to giving to the world some outward and visible sign of that breach. But I do say, neither here in the House of Lords, nor in the other House of Parliament, nor in the country at large, certainly by none who have the honour and dignity of this country at heart, has there been any other sentiment felt or expressed than that this war should cease. Our desire for the future of America herself, for her people, for her power, leads us to hope for the termination of this unnatural contest. If, despite all we have said and done, there still exists on the other side of the Atlantic such bitter animosity against this country, we must bear with it—we must be prepared to receive, as arising from the excitement of war and the general disturbance of the public mind, imputations and expressions not founded in truth or justice, feeling that the uprightness and dignity of this country can afford to pass them by in silence. My Lords, Her Majesty refers "with heartfelt grief to the severe distress which that war has inflicted upon a large class of Her Majesty's subjects, but which have been borne by them with noble fortitude and resignation." No such blow has, indeed, before fallen upon England; and it has been met in the most noble spirit of munificent charity; but we cannot look forward to a chronic state of things such as that described in Her Majesty's Speech, in which a large portion of the most industrious of our population are maintained merely by the outstretched hand of charity, without feelings of apprehension. There must be an end to such a state of things, and that end is to be found by bringing about a peaceful solution of the difficulty on the other side of the Atlantic. But whatever is done by England to that end must be done only in a manner consistent with our honour, and only attempted when the proper moment shall seem to have arrived. I must say—though that is but small consolation—that the result of the distress in the cotton districts has shown that in the days in which we live more confidence is to be placed in the people at large, in their good sense, courage, and forbearance, than in times gone by could have been expected. It was scarcely possible that a greater trial could have visited a very large body of the people than that which has now fallen on Lancashire; yet it has been borne without an outrage or crime, so that their conduct has excited the admiration of the world at large. It has been said over and over again, but still I must repeat it here—for what comes from your Lordships on so important an occasion as on the night of your first meeting, must come with great weight—it would have been impossible for the country at large to have escaped that disturbance and violence which has prevailed during periods of distress in times past, but for the good sense and patience which have characterized the suffering classes. Speaking of the relief of so great a distress as this, I should be wanting both in memory and gratitude, if I did not say that not England only in its length and breadth has nobly done her duty, but that England's sons all over the world, especially in her colonies, have been among the most ready to send contributions home to relieve it. I may go one step further, and say, that if there has been one bright spot upon the troubled surface of America itself, it is that her citizens, in the midst of all their troubles, have not forgotten that the claims of charity are paramount. What has been done, and, I fear, what remains to be done, has thrown on many an amount of work, of anxiety, and of organization, which there are men, and women too, I must add, in this country always prepared to exhibit, but which have been better shown in this emergency than perhaps on any former occasion. While the magnitude of the distress was scarcely yet known, there was a cry of distress; but before that cry met with a wide and general response, a distinct determination was expressed throughout the country at large that all parties, as far as they could be reached, should be called on to bear their part, and that the funds should be administered as purely and as satisfactorily as possible; and, from all I can learn, but one sentiment is to be heard, of deep thankfulness to those who have come forward to contribute and to administer those funds. My Lords, Her Majesty informs us that She has concluded a Treaty of Commerce with the King of the Belgians, and without doubt such treaties, when they come into operation, will contribute, as other commercial treaties have already done, to the prosperity of this country. But, independent of treaties, there are other relations with foreign countries, and which Her Majesty refers to in the Speech, on which this country has set its heart. I trust that England adheres to the principle of non-interference, and that other countries will be induced to adopt the same. There is one country which will never be itself till foreign intervention is removed. I am sure that I speak the sentiments of the great majority of the English people when I say that they desire to see Italy left to its own course, that it may once more take its place among the nations of Europe; and that as it is now, from its climate and natural beauty, a very Paradise of the earth, it may become equally distinguished for the freedom and prosperity of its people. This, I venture to say, is the sincere desire of your Lordships, as it is of the nation at large. That this will be so I have no doubt, though when it will be must depend upon those who can move only as the affairs of the world move, neither hastening nor retarding them, but accepting events as they arise.

My Lords, having now touched on some of the principle paragraphs of Her Majesty's Speech, I must, before I sit down, turn to a matter more personal to your Lordships, and lament that one has passed away from this (the Ministerial) side of the House, who has long enjoyed the deep respect of all who have been either politically associated with or opposed to him, for in private life there was not one of your Lordships who had the honour of knowing him who has not been his sincere friend. The Marquess of Lansdowne stood in your Lordships' House rich in all the experience of years, and invested, as they rolled on, with an authority which could be derived only from length of years and vast experience. It will be remembered that not many years ago he took formal leave of official life, and intimated that it was not his intention again, except very occasionally, to take a part in the debates of this House. His voice is now closed in death, and that calm judgement and mild wisdom which lent so much force and weight to the counsels he gave are lost for ever.

For myself, my Lords, I must be allowed to add that whatever claim the importance of my subject may have on your Lordships' attention, I am indebted solely to your kind indulgence for so patient a hearing of these very imperfect remarks.

The noble Earl concluded by moving that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as follows:—

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

"WE, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble

Thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has commanded to be made to both Houses of Parliament.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has declared Your Consent to a Marriage between His Royal Highness The Prince of Wales and Her Royal Highness The Princess Alexandra, Daughter of Prince Christian of Denmark, and for commanding that the Treaty which has been concluded thereupon with The King of Denmark should be laid before us.

"We humbly express to Your Majesty our full Participation in Your Majesty's Sentiments on an Event so interesting to Your Majesty, and which, with the Blessing of God, will, we trust, prove so conducive to the Happiness of Your Majesty's Family and the Welfare of Your People; and assure Your Majesty that we will make Provision for such an Establishment as may be thought suitable to the Rank and Dignity of the Heir Apparent to the Crown of these Realms.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that we cannot fail to be highly gratified and deeply to feel the unsolicited and spontaneous Manifestation of Goodwill towards Your Majesty and Your Family, and of a due Appreciation of the Benefits conferred by the Principles and Practice of the British Constitution, which has led the Greek Nation to express so strong a Desire that Your Majesty's Son, Prince Alfred, should accept the Greek Crown.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us that the Diplomatic Engagements of Your Majesty's Crown, together with other weighty Considerations, have prevented Your Majesty from yielding to this general Wish of the Greek Nation.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that with Your Majesty we trust that the same Principles of Choice which led the Greek Nation to direct their Thoughts, in the first instance, towards His Royal Highness Prince Alfred, may guide them to the Selection of a Sovereign under whose Sway the Kingdom of Greece may enjoy the Blessings of internal Prosperity and of peaceful Relations with other States; and express our Thanks to Your Majesty for informing us, that if in such a State of Things the Republic of the Seven Islands should declare a deliberate Wish to be united to the Kingdom of Greece, Your Majesty would be prepared to take such Steps as may be necessary for a Revision of the Treaty of November 1815, by which that Republic was reconstituted, and was placed under the Protection of the British Crown.

"We humbly express the Gratification with which we learn that Your Majesty's Relations with Foreign Powers continue to be friendly and satisfactory.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has abstained from taking any Step with a view to induce a Cessation of the Conflict between the contending Parties in the North American States, because it has not seemed to Your Majesty that any such Overtures could be attended with a Probability of Success.

"We assure Your Majesty that we share in the Concern with which Your Majesty has viewed the desolating Warfare which still rages in those Regions, and in the heartfelt Grief with which Your Majesty has witnessed the severe Distress and Suffering which that War has inflicted upon a large Class of Your Majesty's Subjects, but which have been borne by them with noble Fortitude and with exemplary Resignation; and we trust with Your Majesty that this Suffering and this Distress are rather diminishing than increasing, and that some Revival of Employment is beginning to take place in the manufacturing Districts.

"We humbly express to Your Majesty our deep Gratification at the abundant Generosity with which all Classes of Your Majesty's Subjects in all Parts of Your Empire have contributed to relieve the Wants of their suffering Fellow Countrymen; and at the Liberality with which Your Majesty's Colonial Subjects have on this Occasion given their Aid; proving that although their Dwelling Places are far away, their Hearts are still warm with unabated Affection for the Land of their Fathers; and we humbly convey to Your Majesty our Sense of the Value of the constant and laborious Attention with which the Relief Committees have superintended the Distribution of the Funds intrusted to their Charge.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has concluded with the King of the Belgians a Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, and a Convention respecting Joint Stock Companies, and for directing that Treaty and Convention to be laid before us, together with Papers relating to the Affairs of Italy, of Greece, and of Denmark, and to Occurrences which have lately taken place in Japan.

"We humbly express to Your Majesty our Satisfaction at learning that, notwithstanding the Continuance of the Civil War in North America, the general Commerce of the Country during the past Year has not sensibly diminished; that the Treaty of Commerce which Your Majesty concluded with The Emperor of the French has already been productive of Results highly advantageous to both the Nations to which it applies; and that the general State of the Revenue, notwithstanding many unfavourable Circumstances, has not been unsatisfactory.

"THAT with Your Majesty we trust that these Results may be taken as Proofs that the productive Resources of the Country are unimpaired.

"We humbly convey to Your Majesty the Expression of our deep Gratification at the Spirit of Order which happily prevails throughout Your Majesty's Dominions, and which is so essential an Element in the Well-being and Prosperity of Nations.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that we will give our most serious Attention to the various Measures of public Usefulness and Improvement which may be submitted for our Consideration; and that with Your Majesty we fervently pray that the Blessing of Almighty God may attend our Deliberations, and guide them to the Promotion of the Welfare and Happiness of Your Majesty's People."

THE EARL OF GRANARD: My Lords, it is with considerable diffidence that I rise to second the Address, so ably moved by the noble Earl beside me, for it may be truly said that that noble Earl has so fully exhausted the subject that there is little left for me to comment upon. I trust, however, that in the few observations which I shall make I shall receive your Lordships' usual indulgence.

My Lords, most naturally does the Royal Speech allude to the topic now foremost in the minds of Her Majesty's subjects—the marriage of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales;—and I am sure it is unnecessary for me to ask your Lordships whether you participate in the language of the Speech in regard to an event so interesting to Her Majesty, and which, with the blessing of God, She trusts will prove so conducive to the happiness of Her family and the welfare of Her people. My Lords, as the nation sympathized with Her Majesty in Her bereavement and sorrow, and would gladly give her every consolation in its power; so it also sympathizes in the joy She must feel at seeing the Heir Apparent about to enter into those engagements which, from the character of the high contracting parties, promise to bring about a renewal of that spectacle of unalloyed happiness and uninterrupted good example which so eminently distinguished the married life of his Royal parents. And, though it is awkward to speak on such a subject in His Royal Highness's presence, I venture to say, without any fear of contradiction, that no British Prince has ever had the same advantages in beginning life as, under the prudent guidance of Her Majesty and Her illustrious Consort, His Royal Highness has enjoyed, in being able to make himself acquainted with those subjects which would fit him at some future—it is to be hoped distant—time, to assume the Crown of these realms. He has, after careful study, been enabled to read in that best of books, the world, under different aspects and in different climes. He has visited regions that would have been deemed inaccessible by many private gentlemen in the last century, and he has had an opportunity of judging by personal observation of many of the Governments and nations of the Old World and the New. In the one hemisphere he has wandered among the relics of a bygone civilization, while in the other he has seen—what in all human probability none of us will ever see again—the great Republic of the western world in its pristine entirety; and no doubt His Royal Highness has, in his own mind, contrasted these things with those home institutions which have now stood for centuries, vigorous and unimpaired, that greatest test, the decaying hand of Time.

My Lords, your Lordships will next, no doubt, recognise with satisfaction the compliment paid to Her Majesty and to this country by the spontaneous offer made of the crown of Greece for Prince Alfred; and you will also see with satisfaction in that offer an additional proof that the present aspirations of the nationalities of Europe tend more to the principles of sound constitutional government than to those principles of anarchy and disorder which produced such disastrous results in the years 1848 and 1849. Still, your Lordships will, I think, agree in the wisdom which dictated the refusal of the vacant throne of Greece, however tempting the offer. It was not for Her Majesty's Government to disregard the engagements from time to time entered into by wise Administrations relative to the affairs of Greece. But, even taking it upon lower ground, it would scarcely have been advisable to place a British Prince in a position which, from its peculiar nature, might have brought the policy of this country into closer contact with the entanglements of that Eastern question, the solution of which is so fraught with danger to the peace of Europe. We can, therefore, in the language of the Speech, only continue to show our goodwill towards the Greeks, and trust that the moderation which has hitherto prevailed in their councils may lead them to choose such a Prince as will not only give them the happiness they deserve, but will also develop the neglected resources of their country. Should that happen, I trust that your Lordships will agree in the prudence of the proposal that Her Majesty should negotiate with the other Powers to permit the Ionian Republic to be added to Greece, thereby correcting the mistake made by former treaties in restricting too much the territory of that kingdom, proving also our appreciation of the goodwill manifested towards us by the spontaneous election of Prince Alfred, and proclaiming our interest in the welfare and prosperity of Greece.

My Lords, your Lordships have no doubt heard with satisfaction that Her Majesty's friendly relations with Foreign Powers have suffered no diminution.

My Lords, I come now to a topic of the Royal Speech to which renewed prominence has been given by a late French despatch—I mean the question of mediation in the civil war now raging in America. However much your Lordships deplore the continuance of a war so materially affecting ourselves, and however much we hope for its speedy termination, yet I think your Lordships will approve the prudence which dictated a policy of non-intervention to Her Majesty's Government, and will agree that our interference in American affairs would only have produced intense irritation among the American people. It might have given rise to unpleasant complications, revived ancient jealousies, and certainly would have had no effect in putting an end to the strife. It was, therefore, much better to leave to the Emperor of the French the task which he had imposed on himself, with the hope that his generous intentions and good counsels might be accepted by the contending parties.

My Lords, the natural sequence to the paragraph on the American war is an allusion to the sad and unmerited affliction which has fallen upon our operatives in Lancashire. And here I cannot refrain from paying my humble meed of admiration to the noble manner in which those sufferings have been borne. Formerly the news of distress in the manufacturing districts filled the public mind with serious apprehension; but nothing could have more strongly proved the gradual improvement which has taken place among the operative classes during the last twenty years, than the way in which they have endured their present affliction. There are many noble Lords present who may remember past distress in the manufacturing districts, the bitter array of class against class, the infuriate complaint, and the armed repression of the sufferers. Now, the only struggle is a most noble one—it is only who shall be most forward in alleviating the distress, and, among the labourers, who shall show the best example of patience, fortitude, and manly resignation. You have seen Her Majesty's name foremost in the list of subscribers, and all your Lordships must have noticed the princely donation of the noble Earl opposite, whose historic name is so intimately connected with Lancashire, and to whom that county is even more deeply indebted than for his generosity for the able management he has brought to bear upon the distribution of the relief fund. It must be a matter of satisfaction to your Lordships to reflect, that if the cry of distress has gone far and wide, the response has reached the length and breadth of the land likewise, and it has come not only from this country but from the uttermost parts of our vast colonial empire, proving, in the words of the Royal Speech, "that although their dwelling-place is far away, their hearts are still warm with unabated affection for the land of their fathers." As an Irishman I am proud that Ireland has responded to the prompting of gratitude; that she has not forgotten the helping hand that was stretched forth to her when the dark cloud of adversity swept over the land. If I may be permitted to say so, the contributions from Ireland are the more creditable because at the present moment considerable distress exists in that country. There have been three successive bad harvests, the trade of the country has proportionately declined, and I am afraid that many of the farmers will be without the means to crop the land this season. I therefore venture to express a hope that Parliament will during the present Session give its sanction to measures authorizing works of arterial drainage, and to some such useful measures as will enable them not only to develop the resources of the country, but to alleviate the existing distress. Your Lordships will have learned with satisfaction that Her Majesty has concluded a Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with the King of the Belgians. Your Lordships are also told that various measures of public usefulness and improvement will be submitted for your consideration; and no doubt one among them will probably be a measure embodying the recommendation of the Royal Commission now inquiring into the subject of convict management. I trust your Lordships will bear with me if I state that I think an erroneous impression is now abroad respecting the relative merits of the English and Irish systems of convict management. I do not wish to cast any reflections on any particular person or measure; but although, in common with most people, I give the preference to the Irish system of gaol and convict management, yet I think that the difference between the classes of criminals with which the two systems have to deal has not been sufficiently taken into account. In Ireland most of the crimes are committed from passion or impulse. Hence there are fewer relapses into crime than in England; and to that circumstance, and also to the fact that ticket-of-leave men are kept under police surveillance, I ascribe the more satisfactory results of the Irish convict system.

My Lords, Her Majesty ends Her most gracious Speech by praying that the blessing of Almighty God may guide our counsels to the promotion of the welfare and happiness of Her people. May I now also fitly conclude by a prayer, in which I am sure your Lordships will join with me?—that Almighty God will continue His blessing on Her Majesty and Her Royal House, and on him whom for the first time we have the pleasure of seeing among us this evening! My Lords, it only remains to me to second the Address which has been moved by my noble Friend. [See Page 14.]

THE EARL OF DERBY:—My Lords, there is one topic touched upon in the Speech delivered from the Throne with respect to which there will be, most decidedly, no difference of opinion among your Lordships, and with regard to which we may freely express our feelings without any mental reservation, any arrière pensée, or any protest with a view to future proceedings. This time last year it was our melancholy duty to present to the widowed Sovereign of this country a tribute of respect, condolence, sympathy, and affection, as deep and genuine as was ever offered by a great nation to the possessor of its Throne. This year a different and a more pleasing duty devolves upon us. In place of the language of condolence upon the direst calamity which could afflict our Sovereign's heart—a calamity which still bows her down in sorrow—a sorrow that will never cease—we have to substitute the language of congratulation upon an event which in every point of view must be a source of consolation, of comfort, and even of rejoicing to Her Majesty, as it must be to Parliament and the country at large. We have now to congratulate Her Majesty and the country upon the approaching marriage of the heir to the Throne, of that illustrious Prince whom we have had the honour and the happiness of receiving within our walls this day; we have to congratulate Her Majesty and him upon an event which, as far as human foresight can tell, promises to His Royal Highness the greatest amount of happiness which can be enjoyed in this life. It is not to him alone as heir to the Throne, however, that we tender our respectful congratulation. We congratulate one who has already by the courtesy of his demeanour and the amiability of his manners won the regard and affection of those who have been privileged to approach him; one who at a very early age, when placed in circumstances of no inconsiderable difficulty, has displayed a tact, a judgment, a discretion which promise well for the results of his future career. My Lords, we congratulate Her Majesty and His Royal Highness upon his approaching union with a Princess of whom all who have the happiness of knowing her personally speak in terms implying their conviction that, endowed with every gift of person and of mind, she is fully qualified to take upon herself that high lot which destiny has assigned to her, and to become the partner of the Sovereign of the greatest empire in the world. We rejoice also in reflecting that Her Royal Highness comes from a country between the inhabitants of which and our own there are many points of similarity of character, many natural and national ties, and much community of interests; a country enjoying a constitutional monarchy, and that constitutional monarchy one the integrity and independence of which, I may venture to say, is a matter which never can be regarded with indifference by the Parliament, the people, or, I hope, the Government of England. I can express upon this subject no better wish for His Royal Highness than that in the approaching most important event of his life he and the Princess whom he has chosen to share his high position may enjoy happiness as unalloyed—God grant that it may be far more lasting!—as that which fell to the lot of his illustrious parents.

My Lords, turning from this to a certain degree personal, but yet most deeply interesting and important topic, I am happy to be able to say, touching a subject which engages the attention of all men in all parts of the world, that I have no fault to find with, no objection to raise to, the course which Her Majesty's Government have pursued with respect to what is justly called the "desolating warfare" now raging in the hitherto United States of America. I may regret, indeed, that Her Majesty's Government did not feel themselves justified in joining in the attempt, however hopeless that attempt might appear, to which they were invited by the Sovereign of France; not, as the noble Earl who has just spoken, by a slip of the tongue, said, for the purpose of putting an end to the war, but with the view of endeavouring by good offices to obtain such an armistice or cessation of hostilities as might lead the two parties themselves to reflect upon the miseries and hopelessness of the war in which they are at present engaged. I think it is matter of regret that Her Majesty's Government did not feel themselves justified in acceding to the wish of the Emperor of the French; but before I censure the course pursued by them, it is only fair I should say that they were in possession of much better means of information than any I can pretend to as to whether such an interference as the one contemplated, intended to put an end to the war, might not rather have aggravated the bitterness of the strife by the irritation arising from any foreign intervention. Upon that point, which doubtless they considered in all its bearings, they were probably enlightened by the despatches of our Minister at Washington. I therefore take no objection to the course pursued, although I regret that no attempt was made to promote the restoration of peace. "Mediation" would, perhaps, not be a correct or legitimate expression to apply to that proposed species of intervention. I presume that, previous to attempting mediation, the two parties should be agreed upon the terms, or at all events the principles, upon which it ought to be conducted; but, if I know anything of the state of feeling in the Northern and Southern States, the question at issue between them is not a question of degree, but a question of fundamental principle, as to which there can be no mediation, because it is a question on one side of the continuance of the Union, and on the other of separation. And so much being decided, it is necessary to determine on what principle the negotiations should proceed—whether on the principle of maintaining the Union in its integrity, or of acquiescing in the separation of the two bodies. I feel that that difficulty meets us at the outset; and I greatly fear from the language of the respective parties that at present the consent of both could not be obtained to either principle. It has been said by personal and political friends of my own—men for whose opinions I entertain the highest respect—that the time has arrived when it is desirable that we should recognise the Southern Republic. Upon that subject, regretting as I do to differ from any of my friends, I confess I cannot bring myself to the conclusion that the time has arrived at which it is either wise, politic, or even legitimate, to recognise the South. I do not think the circumstances have yet occurred under which a revolting State is entitled to recognition from neutral Powers. The first of those circumstances is where, although the State from which a secession has taken place has not acquiesced in it as a fait accompli, yet the war is, in point of fact, at an end, and no struggle is going on for the restoration of the original dominion. That was the case when the States of South America revolted from Spain. For a long period before those States were recognised by the Powers, Spain had ceased to take any active steps to keep them under her rule. Although, therefore, Spain did not recognise their independence, we did recognise it, because the struggle was in fact at an end. Another set of circumstances under which recognition is legitimate is where other nations, having in the interests of humanity determined that a desolating warfare shall no longer be continued, in order to put an end to it agree to recognise the revolting party. But in that case recognition is always followed by something further, for it means nothing unless the Powers who join in it are ready to support by force of arms the claims of the State which they recognise. That was the case with regard to Belgium in its separation from Holland; such was the case with regard to Greece in its separation from Turkey. No doubt there are occasions when the horrors of war and the danger to the public interests of the world from the prolongation of a contest, are so great that it is essential it should be terminated by other nations intervening to recognise the Secessionists; but when such a case does occur, they must be prepared to go a step further, and to maintain by force the independence which they have acknowledged. I cannot but think that this consideration has not been sufficiently weighed by those who are anxious for the recognition of the South. My conviction, which has been strengthened by everything which has occurred from the first outbreak of the civil war, is that the restoration of the Union as it formerly existed is the one conclusion which is absolutely impossible. I believe that at first the feelings of this country were strongly in favour of the North, and that it was not generally supposed that the North would have any great difficulty in overrunning and subduing the South. But even at that early period it was perceived, that if the North were to succeed in subjugating the South, its difficulties would only commence; because it was out of the question that where such mutual animosity existed, and such injuries had been inflicted on one side and on the other, any cordial reconciliation or union could take place between them. If it was so a year or two ago, how much stronger must this conviction have grown when day by day the struggle becomes more desperate, when it is more apparent that neither party can obtain a signal and decisive advantage over the other, the one on the defensive being always the one which has practically the best of it; and when it is obvious that the continuance of the war is the continuance of the most dreadful slaughter and the most harrowing carnage, accompanied by increasing bitterness of feeling, and accompanied, if we may believe reports, by aggravating atrocities on both sides, which add unusual horrors to those by which war, and especially a civil war, is attended? Under these circumstances, I declare my firm conviction that there is no possibility of re-establishing the Union between the North and the South. At the same time, recollect, the struggle is still going on. The whole sea-board of the South is in the possession of the North, and large Federal armies are in Southern territory, where they obtain occasional advantages. That being the case, it is impossible to say that the struggle has practically ceased, so as to admit of our recognition, even if we did not mean to go further; and I do not believe that those who are the most anxious for recognition under existing circumstances are prepared for an interference by force of arms, and insisting on laying down the terms on which a separation is to take place. Therefore, I own I approve, on the whole, of the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government on this subject, and of that entire neutrality which, I believe, they have practically carried out to the utmost of their power, in accordance with their professions. There is another point. No man with ordinary sentiments of humanity can fail earnestly to desire that the desolating warfare in America should be brought to a close, and I am quite certain that the present Government or any other which might be in power in this country, would eagerly embrace the first opportunity that had a fair prospect of success of tendering such good offices as might lead to a cessation of hostilities. At the present moment I do not, I am sorry to say, see any prospect of such a result, and I fear that the war must go on until both of the combatants simultaneously see the necessity of coming to some settlement.

My Lords, there is another aspect in which this war has serious bearings—on the industry, happiness, and prosperity of England. The cessation of the cotton supply could not happen without causing much distress; but I need not say that both parties in America, and more particularly the South—and, indeed, some parties in this country—have exaggerated the importance of the suspension of the cotton trade to this country; and it is not undesirable that this exaggerated impression should be corrected, for it goes to the extent that it is an absolute necessity for us to submit to any terms rather than that our great industry should be interfered with. There is no doubt that the distress in the cotton districts, if not altogether caused by, has been greatly aggravated by the war in the United States. The sudden cutting-off of the raw material of a manufacture which had risen to such an unparalleled height must produce great distress and disastrous consequences to those who are engaged in that particular manufacture. But I regret to say I cannot see that the sudden cessation of the war in America would of itself restore the prosperity of this important industry, or even replace on a satisfactory footing a great portion of the population whose sufferings have excited so much sympathy and compassion. And, in speaking of this subject, I cannot but express my thanks to the noble Earl who seconded the Address (the Earl of Granard) for the manner in which he has spoken of the very small service which it was in my power personally to render towards the relief of destitution in the manufacturing districts. Connected as I am with that county and with that manufacturing district, it has fallen to my lot to take a considerable share in the distribution of those funds which have been so liberally contributed by all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. But there are many whose exertions in the same cause have been equal to and greater than mine. There are men who had far less time to spare, and yet who devoted a much larger share of attention to the relief of that distress than I have. Nothing can be more gratifying than the conduct of the immediate sufferers; nothing more gratifying to observe than the way in which men in business, engaged in transactions on which it was necessary for them to bestow constant attention, gave hours and days and weeks and months of their time gratuitously and without the slightest recompense, except the consciousness of the good they were doing, to the alleviation of the distress around them. I am convinced that the sufferings at present endured by the manufacturing population have led to another and most valuable result. It has brought forth a great amount of kindly feeling among different classes. It has enabled the rich and poor to understand each other better than before; and has taught them to remember their mutual dependence on one another. It has led the rich to think of the duties they owe to the poor, and it has shown to the poor that the rich are not unmindful of them. It is impossible to speak in terms of too high praise of the manner in which that large population has borne its suffering and distress. More than once—and it speaks well for the confidence and kindly feeling that prevail in that population—when complimented on their endurance and patience, they have answered simply, "We knew you would not let us starve." The liberality of the country has been unbounded, and it has proceeded from every class of the community. The feeling of national and kindly relationship has been warmly and cordially responded to from Her Majesty's widely extended colonial possessions, and I rejoiced to hear the noble Earl who seconded the Address take notice—a notice which I think might have been gracefully taken in Her Majesty's Speech—of the large and spontaneous contributions, which, in the midst of their own difficulties, have been offered to our manufacturing population by the inhabitants of the Northern States of America. Large, however, as has been the amount subscribed, anxious as have been the labours of the Relief Committee, careful as has been the distribution of the bounty, I fear that I cannot say there is at present any reason for the cessation of the public liberality. Large as the funds are, and no doubt they are sufficient to guard the population for some time to come against famine, and that disease which springs from destitution, I cannot look forward to the termination of the existing distress within a limited period. Indeed, for a considerable time it is impossible that the cotton manufacturing interest can fail to be in deep distress. I am far from desiring to utter a word which should in the slightest take away from the merit of the labouring classes on account of the manner in which they have borne the sufferings that have fallen on them; but, undoubtedly, one of the consequences of the abundant liberality of the public in relieving the distress has been that, not the industrious workman—not the highly-paid labourer—not the man who had enjoyed comparative prosperity—but that those who were on the verge of pauperism, or were paupers themselves, have been in receipt of fully as good or a better supply of the necessaries of life than they were accustomed to receive under ordinary circumstances. This is a point which will require the most ample consideration and careful watching, when the distress shall be mitigated, as it is calculated to raise questions of most serious embarrassment. I will not trouble your Lordships with them at present, but it will be satisfactory to your Lordships to know that they relate to the effects of a too liberal distribution of relief among the lowest classes. At the same time, your Lordships will see that it was impossible to make a distinction in the distribution of relief between those who had been earning 30s., 35s., and 40s. a week as wages and those who had only earned 7s. or 8s.; and, consequently, by the higher class of workmen the distress will be felt the most severely, while by the lowest it will scarcely be felt at all. There is no danger of demoralizing or of destroying the self-dependence of the higher class of workmen, for the moderate contributions they receive for the support of life and health without work would be but a moderate substitute for the large amount of comfort and comparative affluence which they derive from honest industry; but the danger exists in reference to the lower class now receiving assistance from public funds when they come to fall back on the ordinary state of things and their ordinary resources. I say I think there is a certainty that the period of distress in the cotton districts has not nearly reached its close. It is undoubtedly satisfactory, as noticed in the Royal Speech, that there is a slight diminution in the number of those receiving relief, either from parochial funds or other sources; but I must express my fear that that diminution is but temporary and occasional, and that there must be for a considerable time a fluctuation in the amount of diminution. Let us now see what is the state of the markets. According to the present state of things, which no doubt may arise from the American war, the price of cotton goods at Manchester is not sufficient to pay for the labour of working up the raw cotton; and it follows that, notwithstanding the great diminution in our Indian and Chinese trade, cotton goods at the present moment in the markets of the East, in India and China, are selling at a rate 25 per cent lower than in Manchester. I was assured the other day by one of the most intelligent merchants that, according to present calculation, though it may be difficult to ascertain the stocks in the interior of China or India, there is reason to apprehend that not a single pound of cotton goods could be sent to India or China in the next year with a chance of obtaining a remunerating price. From a calculation of what cotton is likely to come in, it appeared that though it would be considerably less than had been imported in more favourable times, yet the probable amount would be sufficient to supply effectively the demand of the whole world, with the exception of India and China; but it would not enable the workman to obtain more than three days' employment in the week, with a loss of wages for this year of £9,000,000, and for the next year of £6,000,000. I trust your Lordships will pardon me for going into these details, but I have taken anxious pains to ascertain the facts, and they are of importance. The state of the market at present is such that, according to the price of raw cotton at Liverpool, it will not pay the manufacturers at Manchester to work it up. The market is in a most sensitive condition. There is a vast amount of capital invested in machinery, and employers are waiting eagerly to seize the first opportunity of the turning of the scale, and making the slightest amount of profit. They are watching the Liverpool market with the deepest anxiety, and the moment there may be a fall of a 1d. or 2d. per pound, there are, notwithstanding the glut in the markets, numbers of persons ready to rush in and make use of the opportunity of working up the cotton. The result is that there is an increase in the quantity of goods in the market, there is a constant alternation between the price at which a small profit may be realized and that on which there would be a loss; and the consequence is that the small capitalists must go to the ground; they could not support themselves or maintain their workmen by working three days in the week; and the large capitalists will absorb the remainder of the business, and at the least one-half of the cotton operatives will be out of work. In this state of things I wish I could say that in the next two or three years I see a prospect of the cotton manufacture coming up, I do not say to the point which it reached in 1860 and 1861—for I do not know whether that would be desirable—but to an ordinary degree of prosperity. I am quite certain that for a considerable period there must be great depression in that branch of manufacture; and I hope the public will not be led away by the notion that any slight diminution of distress which may be felt at the present time can be relied on as being permanent, but that they will be prepared, if necessary, for continued exertions to carry this large and important population through the fearful crisis.

My Lords, I have perhaps spoken at greater length than is desirable on a subject connected with one question of foreign policy. There are other topics of considerable importance adverted to in the Royal Speech. Papers relative to Italy, Greece, and Denmark are promised to be laid before the House. Unfortunately, we have already had a partial publication of papers on the subject of each of these three countries, and I confess that I am unable to offer my congratulations to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs on the brilliant success which has attended his diplomatic achievements, with respect to which he seems somewhat ambitious. There have been made known some despatches from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with respect to Denmark which I looked at with a little astonishment; because I recollected what were the principles and declarations on former occasions of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary, and of the noble Viscount at the head of the Government; and I confess I was at a loss to reconcile those principles and declarations with the recommendations and advice contained in these despatches. I read the correspondence, I confess, with some feeling of humiliation, for I found among it four documents, and I entertained serious doubts which of the four reflected the greatest amount of ridicule on British diplomacy. The first despatch is one from the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary, originating quite gratuitously a discussion and tendering advice which certainly was not asked for, and, equally certainly, was not taken. The next despatch is an able and statesman-like reply given by the Danish Minister to the proposition of the noble Earl. The third despatch—if, indeed, it be a genuine one—is addressed by the Swedish Government to the British Government, thanking the noble Earl for communicating information, which Sweden already knew, respecting the purport of the first; and the fourth, about the genuineness of which there is no doubt, is a despatch addressed by a certain Count Elsinore to a certain Count Russell. I must say, that if I had to determine which of these four despatches is most successful in casting ridicule upon our diplomacy, I should have to give the supremacy to the original despatch of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary. The noble Earl and myself once had the happiness to be colleagues of one of the most agreeable, most able, and shrewdest of men, the late Lord Melbourne, who also possessed a great deal of ordinary common sense.

The Earl of Derby

There was one piece of advice which he was inculcating upon his colleagues; but by which I am afraid the noble Earl has not profited. When any matter arose which involved considerable difficulty and embarrassment, and which it was not known how to dispose of at the moment, Lord Melbourne's favourite receipt was, "Can't you let it alone?" I am sure the noble Earl must recollect as well as I do that saying of the noble Lord, "Can't you let it alone? It will do very well if you only let it alone." But that is the very thing which, with all his experience, and with the example of Lord Melbourne before him, the noble Earl cannot do. He cannot let it alone. We know that the courage and confidence of the noble Earl, in undertaking to surmount any possible difficulty, have been proverbial since the days of Sidney Smith. If there be any difficulty of any kind to be settled—if there is any Constitution to be reorganized at once—if there is any embarrassing question which has occupied the attention of statesmen for years, almost for centuries, the noble Earl is quite ready at a minute's notice. His language always is, "Come, I will settle it at once; I will tell you how to do it;" and then, without even the preliminary apology which used to be given by a celebrated character—"I hope I don't intrude"—he offers his advice and assistance to any nation that he may suppose to stand in need of them. That is the case with respect to Denmark; and I hope, my Lords, we shall see somewhat more successful results from the course taken by the noble Earl than those which the Correspondence already published leads me to anticipate. But let me say, apart from all questions as to whether the advice tendered by the noble Earl was good or bad—even supposing it was as good as I think, and as the Danish Government thought it was bad, for they thought it an interference with the prerogatives of the monarchy of Denmark—could not the noble Earl, if he thought it advisable to interfere in the question, have interfered by privately communicating with the Danish Minister, instead of adopting that broad line of interference which has materially aggravated the difficulty, and enabled Russia and Prussia to put a pressure on Denmark, founded upon a principle first enunciated by the Foreign Secretary of this country?

Well, my Lords, if the intervention of the noble Earl in the affairs of Denmark has not been very successful, let us turn to his intervention in Italy. I hope the Italian papers promised in the Speech from the Throne will give us a graphic account of his negotiations with the Pope. If the noble Earl thought that advice ought to be tendered to the Pope, did he think that he was the person from whom the Holy Father would most readily take it? Did he think that in a matter concerning the affairs of Italy he would overcome that reluctance which the Holy Father has shown to permit of interference from other Powers? And what was the moment chosen for this advice and interference? Mr. Odo Russell has an audience of the Pope, in which some general observation is made by His Holiness as to the possibility of his being obliged to ask the hospitality of England. Upon this Mr. Russell is instructed to make a formal offer of a ship, accompanied with an advice that the Pope should take an early opportunity of leaving Rome and accepting an asylum in Malta. The time chosen by the noble Earl for giving this advice was that at which the Emperor Napoleon was telling the Pope, that if he remained at Rome, he would maintain him there with all the power of his protection. Thus while the noble Earl was intervening to induce the Pope to go away, the French Emperor was intervening to keep him where he was. Such is the French alliance, this is the cordiality, the unity, the harmony, with which France and England are acting in the affairs of Italy. But, my Lords, supposing that the advice of the noble Earl had been accepted, would it have been practicable that the Pope should have been maintained by a Protestant Government in a possession where the majority of the people are Roman Catholics? If the noble Earl had sought to find out a position presenting the greatest amount of embarrassment and complication, I cannot conceive one which would come up to such a standard so completely as that of the Pope at Malta under the protection of the British Government. [A laugh.] My Lords, there may be something amusing in the contemplation of such a state of things; but really it is one rather for grave consideration than for laughter.

My Lords, there is another question of very serious importance referred to in the Speech from the Throne. I mean that of the constitution of the new kingdom of Greece and the proposed cession of the Ionian Islands. With respect to the first branch of this subject, I am at a loss to understand the course pursued by the noble Earl and Her Majesty's Government. When the revolution took place, it is only fair to the people of Greece to bear testimony to their good conduct and moderation. In all the proceedings consequent on that movement I do not believe there was a drop of blood shed. Nay more, I believe there was not any violence, or even an intemperate word. And nothing could have been more creditable to the people than the unanimity with which they expressed their wish to be governed by an illustrious Prince, a member of the Royal Family of this country. I think it was a well-earned compliment paid to the Sovereign of this great country, and to the constitutional principles on which her rule is conducted, that the Greeks should in the first instance have expressed a unanimous wish to be presided over by one of the family of that Sovereign. It is, however, stated in the Speech from the Throne that "the diplomatic engagements of Her Majesty's Crown together with other weighty considerations, have prevented Her Majesty from yielding to the general wish of the Greek nation." Those "other weighty considerations" seem to have had their effect with other Royal personages, besides Her Majesty and Her Majesty's Family; for it does not appear that up to this time any Sovereign has been found to accept the throne of Greece. Up to a recent period it had been hoped that arrangements might have been come to which would have given the Greeks a Sovereign; but the latest information on that subject leads us to the supposition that those negotiations have come to an end without the desired object having been effected. However, be that as it may, I want to know why, if those several reasons referred to in the Royal Speech for declining the throne for Prince Alfred existed from the first, a considerable time was allowed to elapse without any contradiction from this country that Prince Alfred was a candidate for their crown? Why was it that instructions were sent out to the British Minister at Athens not to interfere with the progress of events? Why was it that encouragement was given to the people of Greece to persevere in the expressal of their wish? Why was it that hopes were held out by the Greek Minister in this country, after a conference which he had with the noble Earl, that the wishes of the people would be acceded to? Her Majesty's Government are in this dilemma—either they determined from the first that the offer should not be accepted, in which case they acted most ungenerously and unfairly towards a people struggling for freedom; or, at first, they intended that it should be accepted, but have been interfered with and driven back in a not very dignified manner by the strong language of Russia and France. On one horn or other of this dilemma I leave him.

My Lords, another most serious question is the proposed cession of the Ionian Islands. I must look at this question, not only as it affects the Ionian Islands themselves, not only as it affects Greece, but as it affects the interests of this country and the interests of Europe. I am not going to say that Her Majesty's Government could not constitutionally, even without the consent of Parliament, give up the protectorate of this country over those Islands. I do not speak of them as a part of Her Majesty's dominions, so that such a step should be regarded in the light of a dismemberment of the Empire; but I say that they were confided to Great Britain after a consideration of serious questions of European policy, and after grave deliberation on the part of this and other Powers. It had been a matter of much anxiety to Great Britain to obtain those Islands and to retain that possession, and a position such as they afford is not a matter of such indifference to the power of this country as some persons have represented it to be. Observe what was the position of the case previous to 1814. Previously to 1814 most of those Islands had been captured by Great Britain. Corfu had not been in our possession; but for two years before it had been blockaded by the fleets of Great Britain, though it was only after the fall of Napoleon that the French Government surrendered that island to us. So that it was not at that time lightly thought of. From that moment it has been held by Great Britain. At a time when this country was at war, military and naval officers all concurred in the opinion as to the importance of holding and maintaining the Ionian Islands for the purposes of England. One of the latter (Lord Collingwood) said he regarded the possession of Corfu as equal to the addition of two frigates to his fleet. Competent authorities on the subject have stated their opinions as to the importance of our protectorate of those Islands in respect to our position in the Mediterranean and the Adriatic, and on account of their geographical position in respect of the route to India via Egypt. It is not therefore a place to be regarded as worthy of little consideration. I do not mean to say that there may not be some consideration of expenditure connected with this Protectorate, and that it may not to some extent be an embarrassment to have to protect and watch over the most difficult set of men in the world to protect—Ionians travelling in foreign countries; but I do say that positions of such great importance ought not to be surrendered so lightly and so hastily as Her Majesty's Government seem to think they may be, and that considerations of inconvenience and expense ought not to interfere with the holding of positions of great importance to this country. I think I may appeal to the illustrious Duke on the cross benches (the Duke of Cambridge) to corroborate me when I say that during the Crimean war great advantage was felt from the facility those Islands afforded for supplying troops of the line, while we were enabled to garrison them with militia. They afford us a rendezvous for our fleets and give us one of the safest and best harbours in the Mediterranean, while they might prove a source of great embarrassment to us if they were in possession of a naval Power hostile to this country. I am not arguing that under no circumstances that could possibly occur would it be desirable to surrender the Ionian Islands, though I greatly doubt whether it will ever be for the interest of England to give up that nominal Protectorate, which constitutes the Ionian Islands in reality though not in form a British possession. But of this I am sure, that the utmost care and attention ought to be devoted to the subject before Her Majesty's Government come to any conclusion upon a matter of such grave importance. Last year I think the noble Earl, in the House of Commons, when speaking of the great interests which England had in the Adriatic, was interrupted by an hon. Member, who said, "What great interests?" To which the noble Earl replied, "I should have thought the harbour of Corfu afforded a sufficient answer to such a question." Again; it was only last year that the noble Duke the Secretary for the Colonies (the Duke of Newcastle) disclaimed in the most emphatic manner any desire and any intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to surrender these Islands, contending that they were a solemn trust confided to us by Europe, and that we had not the slightest idea of parting with them. But to whom do you part with them? You propose quite gratuitously to cede these Islands to a Government which is not yet formed—to a State which is yet in the throes of revolution. You propose to give them to this State, unasked for, and, as I will presently show you, in direct opposition and contradiction to the principles which have been laid down by the noble Earl himself as those which should regulate the policy of this country. My Lords, in a correspondence which, somewhat gratuitously again, the noble Earl carried on in the course of last year with Prince Gortschakoff, he undertook to lay down certain principles which should regulate the policy of this country in the East, and concluded in terms to which Prince Gortschakoff cordially assented, expressing his great satisfaction at hearing such sentiments from the noble Earl. I have not the exact words by me, but the noble Earl insisted then that there should be a total abandonment by Greece of grandes idées, that the country should abstain from acts of aggression upon the territory of her neighbours, and should keep down the turbulent revolutionary spirit of insurrection which threatened alike all the thrones of Europe. The noble Earl went on to enlarge upon the necessity of preventing Greece from becoming a dangerous enemy of Turkey; and that was the guiding principle he laid down. Well, now, how does he propose to carry out that principle? He proposes to cede the Ionian Islands to Greece, but insists that the form of government there should be monarchical. I presume he means that there shall exist in that country a constitutional monarchy. I presume he means a monarchy in which Parliament shall exercise some control over foreign as well as over domestic policy. Admitting the necessity of procuring the sanction of the Great Powers, it is now proposed that when a monarchy is established in Greece, based on these principles—the abandonment of grandes idées, the non-extension of territory, and non-aggression as regards Turkey—the Great Powers shall be asked to sanction the surrender to that monarchy of the Ionian Islands. Now, that seems to me to be putting off the surrender, ad Græcos

Kalendas. How soon is the noble Earl to be satisfied, not that a constitutional monarchy is established in Greece, but that the Government and Legislature there are sufficiently able, sufficiently willing, and sufficiently determined to discourage that dangerous spirit of aggression against which the noble Earl protests in such strong terms? Then, again, how does the noble Earl assist them to keep down this dangerous spirit? Why, by joining with them a number of Islands, at present under the English Protectorate, the inhabitants of which have been the firmest agitators of that very aggression upon Turkey which the noble Earl says will form an absolute and entire bar to our surrender of these Islands. In proof of this, it is not necessary that I should go further back than to the address of thanks presented by the inhabitants on the first intimation to them of Her Majesty's intention to cede the Islands to Greece. In this address, the people declare their peculiar gratitude, because in that cession they see the future support of England during those struggles which must hereafter take place for the extension of Christianity and of Christian civilization—in other words, for their assaults upon the territories of Turkey. And so the noble Earl assists this constitutional Power to resist the spirit of aggression among its people by uniting with it, as an additional element, a nation which is as one man in favour of that very principle of aggression. The noble Earl will, perhaps, tell me "That is quite true; but our cession of the Ionian Islands is entirely conditional on our terms being complied with." Well, then, I say, could the noble Earl have devised a more ingenious method of rendering the government of that country difficult and impossible than by thus opposing the attainment of the very object upon which they are so obstinately bent? It appears to me that the conditional promise of ceding these Islands to a Government not yet formed, and of whose future policy it is impossible to pronounce any opinion—to a Power utterly incapable, moreover, of coping with the piracy which used to infest those seas, but which has been systematically and successfully kept down by Great Britain—I say the cession of so important a position to such a Government is one of the greatest mistakes which within my memory have been committed by an English Government. My Lords, I do not despair even now that the country will refuse its assent to this most ill-judged proposition. Nay, from the terms used in the Address, in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I think there is some little hesitation on the part of the Government themselves—some little feeling that, after all, the arrangement may utterly fail, and that unexpected circumstances will concur with diplomatic liabilities in preventing the noble Earl from carrying out this measure in favour of the Islands, if it really be in their favour. The noble Duke opposite, in one of his speeches, expressed what I thought was a well-founded belief, that if the good sense and intelligence of the inhabitants could be fairly tested, especially at Corfu, it would be strongly pronounced against the proposed cession and against the popular clamour for that cession which undoubtedly exists. One word more upon this point before I sit down. Look at the position of Corfu, the most important from its harbour and fortifications—as to the efficiency of which, however, I do not say much, and which probably cost more than they ought to have cost. What is the position of Corfu with reference to any part of Greece? It lies eighty miles to the north of the nearest point of the boundary of Greece, but it is within one mile of the coast of Thessaly, a part of the Turkish dominions, which affords favourable opportunities for constant, I will not say invasions—but for constant broils, which will infallibly lead to struggles, in which Greece may get the worst of it, and to some new arrangements, in which Corfu may possibly fall into the hands of some other Power, that Power being neither Greece nor Turkey. On all these grounds I implore the Government to consider the gravity and importance of the step they are about to take. I earnestly conjure Parliament and the country to interpose, by the pressure of public opinion, against an act which is one of the most suicidal and imprudent I ever recollect.

My Lords, upon some occasions we have undoubtedly had to complain that the Government have made great professions for the future, and great promises, which ultimately were not fulfilled. Certainly that is not a complaint which can be justly made at present. It is true that the Seconder of the Address undertook to assure us that one of the Bills which was about to be brought in, in pursuance of Her Majesty's recommendations, was to carry out the views of the Commission recently appointed—and which I think up to this time has had one or two sittings—upon the subject of convict discipline. But I think the noble Earl in this was speaking a little out of the four corners of his brief. Of course, if the noble Earl has had confidential communications with the Government on this point, it is not for me to express doubts of his accuracy; but, subject to this assurance, the Government have not thrown great light upon the measures which they intend to propose during the present Session; so that we run no risk of disappointment, and no blame can hereafter be cast upon them for having fallen short of their professions. I suppose, from the absence of any such promises, we may conclude that Her Majesty's Ministers will be satisfied to be humbly useful; that they will bring forward no very ambitious measures, no very sweeping alterations of the Constitution; that they will not make, or even sanction, any violent attacks upon the Church of England; that they will go calmly and quietly along, improving turnpike-roads and amending the Bankruptcy Bill which they passed the year before last, and that we shall pass altogether a quiet, useful, humdrum Session.

Before sitting down, your Lordships will, I am sure, forgive me for referring to a topic which is not indeed mentioned in the Speech, but which was touched on by one of the noble Earls who have just addressed the House—I mean the public and personal loss which we have all sustained by the death of the venerable and respected Marquess. The noble Earl opposite was a colleague of mine in the Government of which the venerable Marquess was a Member; and I am sure he will feel deeply with me the uniform patience, forbearance, good judgment, and good temper of the venerable Marquess with respect to every question that came before us. Your Lordships had the opportunity of seeing the conduct of the venerable Marquess for several years as the leader of the Government in this House, and some years ago, upon his partial retirement from public life, a most unanimous testimony was afforded of the esteem, respect, love, and affection with which he was regarded both by the supporters of that Government and by the House at large. At a later period, when the venerable Marquess retired from taking any active part in public affairs, he has attended this House less frequently; but in the more private life to which he has confined himself, I am sure that he has not in any degree forfeited the warm affection of his friends, and I am equally certain that he passes from this world honoured and respected, in a good old age, without leaving behind him a single enemy.

EARL RUSSELL:—My Lords, your Lordships will not have been surprised that the greater part of the noble Earl's speech has been taken up with foreign affairs; and especially with the affairs of Greece. For these I am responsible, and those parts of his speech I shall attempt to answer. But first I must touch upon those topics in the noble Earl's speech in respect of which I have the happiness to concur with the noble Earl. And there is no topic more grateful than the first, where we congratulate Her Majesty upon the auspicious marriage that is about to take place. I think we must consider that in wishing happiness to the youthful and Royal pair, we are wishing for the advancement of our own interests, because their happiness may greatly tend to form the happiness of the country at large. Passing from that topic, I come to a question upon which the noble Earl spoke at considerable length; I mean the United States. Upon that topic, also, I am glad to agree, for the most part, in the observations of the noble Earl. I believe that Her Majesty's Government has exercised a wise discretion in not interfering, or rather—for it is not interfering—in not joining in giving advice, as the Emperor of the French proposed, to one of the two belligerents. I think we were right, for this reason—that there may come a time when the belligerents themselves, exhausted by the struggle, may wish to refer to some foreign Power to assist them in making that peace which it is so desirable to establish. As to the question of recognition, the noble Earl has rightly remarked, that there are two kinds of recognition. As examples of the first kind of intervention, we have in old times the cases of Holland and Portugal, and in modern times the cases of Belgium and Greece; but no one in this country, I believe, wishes for a forcible intervention on behalf of either of the parties in this case. The cases of Holland, Portugal, Belgium, and Greece were small matters compared with the vast and dreadful struggle in which we should have to interfere if we attempted to decide the claims of either party to the conflict now raging in America. But there is another kind of recognition, and that is a recognition when it is obvious that one of the parties is exhausted by the war, when the attempt to make the other party submit to his authority has failed, and when therefore peace is anxiously wished. We are not arrived at that point yet, because the struggle now going on in different parts of the United States and of the Southern States is kept up, I will not say with undiminished, but with increased power and rancour, and upon a vaster scale. Therefore nothing could be more unwise at present than to have recourse to the power of recognition. There is one thing, however, which I think may be the result of the struggle, and which to my mind would be a great calamity—that is, the subjugation of the South by the North. If it were possible that the Union could be reformed, if the old feelings of affection and attachment towards it could be revived in the South, I for one would be glad to see the Union restored. If, on the other hand, the North were to feel that separation was finally decreed by the events of the war, I should be glad to see peace established upon those terms. But there may be, I say, one end of the war that would prove a calamity to the United States and to the world—and especially calamitous to the negro race in those countries—and that would be the subjugation of the South by the North. One of the first consequences of such a subjugation must be that the North must keep up a large army, must renounce all its former policy, and must put down by force free discussion and a free press in the South. That would be a dangerous thing. But beside this, would not anarchy prevail in the South? Would not the whole state of society and of labour in the South be disorganized, perhaps for a century to come? I hope, whatever may be the issue of this contest, that such may not be the results. I trust that we shall see at the close of this struggle either one great republic or two great republics in the full enjoyment of freedom and all the advantages of a great and independent Power. For my part, I own that before the contest began I rejoiced in seeing the progress of the United States, and was proud to witness the prosperity of a people descended from our own ancestors, and having the same laws and the same love of personal liberty as ourselves. It was, I think, a spectacle at which every Englishman must rejoice, and I should certainly lament if the end of this struggle did not leave the people in those States in the full enjoyment of the benefits and privileges which dignify and adorn mankind.

The noble Earl next referred to a subject which is indeed a very painful one, and that is the distress in the north. Far be it from me to attempt to follow him into a subject with which he is so much better acquainted than I am; but there is one point upon which he naturally did not dwell in the manner which I think it deserved, and that is the personal contribution which he has himself made of time and labour, to say nothing of munificent contribution, to alleviate the distress in Lancashire. It may be said that others have bestowed more time and more continuous labour to that object; but, however that may be, there was one thing desired which the noble Earl has supplied. It was to be desired that, whatever differences may at other times, and within the last twenty years, have existed between the manufacturing body of Lancashire and the great landed interest of the country, those differences and divisions should be effaced by acts which would show the feelings of charity, of good feeling and goodwill, which the landed interest entertain towards those who were engaged in manufactures, and that the great landed proprietors should be bound together with the manufacturers and the great body of the working classes in one work of benevolence and charity. The example of no man could have contributed so powerfully to the removal of those distinctions as that given by the noble Earl himself, whose munificence to the great body of the working men and their families in the manufacturing districts has been unexampled, and certainly calls for a great tribute of gratitude on the part of the country.

Having now, I am afraid, exhausted all the topics upon which I am so happy as to agree with the noble Earl, I come to those upon which I differ from him, and in respect of which I must take exception to his remarks. He seems to think that I am disposed to meddle in everything. Now, oddly enough, it happens that, with regard to the United States, when we were asked to give advice in conjunction with the French Government, the Government refused to give any advice whatever. Then, as to Mexico, where our co-operation, in the shape of intervention, was desired and invited, we declined to continue that co-operation, and are entirely free from any charge of interference or intervention in that country. These certainly cannot be considered minor affairs. I may also say, although it is a minor subject, but still connected with the great questions of the East, that during the fights and contests that took place last summer in Montenegro—although advice was given by France, by Russia, by Austria, and by Prussia—almost the only Government in Europe that gave no advice was the Government of this country. But the noble Earl speaks of advice which we gave to Denmark and to the Pope of Rome. Of the nature of that advice I will speak presently; but, if I do not mistake, the noble Earl opposite once tendered advice that was not very fortunate to Denmark and Russia; and, if I am not misinformed, he gave some advice during the war in 1859 to Italy. Every one who knew anything of the Italians in 1859 knew well that they had made up their minds to this course of policy—that if it should happen that in the event of a war their Sovereigns should take the popular side and engage in the war against Austria, those princes should retain their thrones, but otherwise they were determined to get rid of their Sovereigns. It appears, however, that advice was given by the British Government to the Grand Duke of Tuscany to resist the popular power, and to the King of Naples to remain neutral. The consequences of following that advice was that both princes lost their thrones. The Grand Duke of Tuscany, instead of taking the popular side in the war between Austria and Sardinia, left his territories and went straight to the Austrian head-quarters. The King of Naples preserved neutrality, but he was driven from his country, and lost his throne. Now, it might not be intervention—it might not be interference—but certainly the advice of the noble Earl had in that instance an effect most unfortunate for those to whom it was tendered. The noble Earl seems to think the advice I gave to the King of Denmark was given without any provocation whatever. I must say the noble Earl in that part of his speech showed a total ignorance of what has been passing of late years. I do not blame him for being ignorant of the facts, but certainly he has made many assertions and assumptions on that ignorance which are not easily justifiable. It did so happen that in 1861 the German Powers had almost determined on an "execution" in Holstein. I pointed out that an execution in Holstein would lead the Germans to the confines of Schleswig. The boundary had never been settled, and I thought the occupation by German troops of a boundary so unsettled, especially with the excitement which then prevailed on both sides, was likely to bring on war between Denmark and Germany, and that that war might extend to other Powers, and so perhaps bring on a European conflict. Now, it may be a great fault, I confess, in one holding the Foreign Office in troubled times, but I have felt exceedingly sensitive as to those circumstances that might bring about a rupture of the general peace; and when I have seen appearances of an approaching storm, I have endeavoured, it may be unsuccessfully—perhaps too frequently—to prevent any chance of war by friendly advice given to one party or the other. My belief is that the advice which Her Majesty's Government gave at that time was conducive to the peace of Europe, because it was settled at that time—in 1861—that, instead of an "execution," which, if persisted in, would have been the commencement of war, Germany and Denmark should negotiate together and endeavour to come to an agreement on points on which they differed. Towards the end of 1862, when these negotiations had gone on without conflict of arms, but with very bitter discussions on one side and the other, it appeared to me that there was no chance of an amicable termination of that correspondence, and I proposed what I thought perfectly compatible with the independence and integrity of Denmark. It so happened that they did not like the plan; they did not agree to it. My conviction is, if they had agreed to it, they would have been in a better and safer position than they are at present, keeping up so vexatious a quarrel, in which the feelings of Germans, though not at present very active, may at any time be roused, and an immense body of Germans may be directed to solve the question. Then the noble Earl finds great fault with the advice he seems to think was very gratuitously given to the Pope. It was not exactly what the noble Earl has read. What happened was this:—Mr. Russell, being in Rome in the beginning of the summer, wished to return home before the unhealthy season. Just before he was coming away he received an intimation that the Pope wished to see him the next day, appointing the hour. Upon the next day Mr. Russell had the honour of an audience with the Pope. The Pope spoke to him very much of Garibaldi being in Sicily; and appearing to have considerable apprehensions as to the state of Italy, he asked the question whether, if he sought an asylum in England, he might rely on our hospitality? To this Mr. Russell returned a general answer, saying that our hospitality was well known, and that we gave asylum to all who sought it. Before Mr. Russell left, the Pope again referred to the subject, adding, "Perhaps I may one day seek the hospitality of England." Now, the noble Earl seems very much surprised; but, for my part, I think nothing was so natural, because it was obvious that if the Pope went to France, Austria, Spain, or any other Catholic country, in the first place there would be great jealousies among other Catholic Powers, and in the next place there is no Catholic Power that would not demand from the Pope some privileges which would excite the jealousies of the rest; whereas if he went to any of Her Majesty's dominions, he might be quite sure that we would ask nothing of him from the beginning of the year to the end of it; we should not interfere with his perfect freedom, and he would thereby be more secure, more at liberty, than in almost any Catholic country. Certain it is, that appeared to be the impression of the Pope. After that I certainly wrote a despatch recommending that course, because I thought it would relieve the Pope from the painful position in which he now stands—a position in which he, an Italian Prince, is opposed to the almost unanimous wish of the rest of Italy, and at the same time feels himself conscientiously bound to defend all the ancient powers and retain all the ancient territories belonging to the Holy See. I must say, however much I may wish the independence of Italy, I cannot help entertaining the greatest respect for the conscientious feelings of the Pope, and regret that he should be exposed to trials to which he cannot conscientiously yield, but which must be painful to sustain, since nearly all his countrymen desire a different course. Well, I wrote that despatch; it was taken in very good part at Rome; Cardinal Antonelli thanked the British Government for the offer, and the Pope afterwards personally thanked Mr.

Russell for the offer made on the part of the British Government; and the report made by Mr. Russell was, that it had produced the best feeling among those who surround the Pope, and who had hitherto considered us personally hostile to him.

"Non obtusa adeo gostamus pectora Pœni."

While I could do so without sacrificing the opinions of the Government with respect to the independence of Italy, I was glad to have given to that venerable man the comfortable assurance that he might resort to the hospitality of England.

The noble Earl's next remarks had reference to the subject of Greece. The noble Earl appears to think that we have had to submit to very strong language from France and Russia, in order to give up the candidature, as it is called, of Prince Alfred. Nothing can be further from the truth. The fact is, that we were the first to propose a joint declaration that none of the Princes belonging to any of the protecting Powers should be capable of accepting or wearing the crown of Greece. It was naturally asked at the same time of the Russian Government whether the Duke of Leuchtenburg, who had been brought up at St. Petersburg as a Russian Prince, who appeared in their almanacks as part of the Imperial family, and was to all intents and purposes part of it, would be excluded by the Protocol of 1830. The answer was, that there were critical doubts about it. We then said—what I think was quite fair—that if we were to have a protocol of exclusion, it must not be merely operative against the Royal Family of England, but must also be operative against the Imperial Family of Russia. We were not prepared to sign anything which applied to Prince Alfred that did not apply to Prince Leuchtenberg. Whereupon that negotiation ceased—at least, for some time. It appeared to me that the proper course was to leave the Greeks entirely free to take their own course in the first instance, and reserve our objections. The consequence of that policy was, that after a time the Russian Ambassador at Her Majesty's Court informed me that he was ready to sign a note excluding Prince Leuchtenburg on the one side, provided Her Majesty would exclude Prince Alfred on the other. It appeared to me that to have left matters depending upon an uncertain and unintelligible protocol would have enabled the Russian Government to propose the Duke of Leuchtenberg, and we might have had complications; but, by the understanding come to, the Princes of all the three families were excluded.

Then the noble Earl came to the subject of the Ionian Islands, on which I confess that I differ from him in toto, both as to his history, his facts, and his principles. The noble Earl admitted, in the first instance, that the Ionian Islands were not a part of the dominions of Her Majesty; but he entirely forgot that fact in all the rest of his observations. Now, what is the history of this Protectorate given to Great Britain? I have heard it orally from a lamented friend of mine, the late Lord Beauvale, who knew all that happened at the Congress of Vienna, and I have found all that he said confirmed in the protocols and treaties of that Congress. As the noble Earl has said, at the end of the war six of these islands were in the possession of Great Britain, having been acquired by her own arms, and the other was temporarily held by another Power. The Austrian Government offered, as they were in a position affecting the tranquillity of Venetia, Dalmatia, and the Adriatic coast, to undertake the government of these islands, securing to the islanders the enjoyment of their own privileges. But it happened that at that time the voice of Russia was very powerful. The results of the campaign had given the Emperor Alexander very great influence with the Congress, and Count Capo d'Istria, a Minister high in that Emperor's confidence, who had a patriotic feeling in favour of the nationality of the Greeks, suggested when Austria made her proposal, that the Ionian Islands should be maintained in all their privileges as a free State under the protection of Great Britain. He said that the institutions of Austria did not give any promise of freedom to the Ionian Islands, but he admired British institutions, and wished the Ionians to have the benefit of them. The consequence of that declaration and that interference of Russia was a treaty in which was it said—that Great Britain should have the fortress of Corfu, to give her power in the Mediterranean? Nothing of the kind—it said that the Ionian Islands, naming each island, should form one single, free, and independent State, under the name of the Republic of the Ionian Islands. So that they are by no means a possession of Great Britain or any part of the Queen's dominions; but are, by that Treaty of 1815, a free and independent State. Well, what becomes of all the argument, if I may call it so, about the importance of the fortress and the position, seeing that these Islands are only under the Protectorate of Great Britain? My opinion is, that having adopted a trust, having made yourselves the protectors of this free and independent State, you are bound to look to the welfare of the Ionians. Above all that you are bound to discharge your duty faithfully and conscientiously towards that free and independent Republic. I believe the importance of Corfu is very much exaggerated. But if you were to say, "We care nothing about the wishes of the Ionian Islands, but what we do care about is a fortress for ourselves, what we do care about is a harbour for Great Britain," I believe that all Europe would cry out upon you for that declaration, and those who gave you that trust would say, "You have perverted the solemn trust confided to you, and that which ought to have been treated according to the original terms of the stipulation for the benefit of the Ionians you have considered only as a part of the strength of your dominions." Because that was the whole gist of the noble Earl's remarks. He never spoke for a moment about the Ionians or their wishes.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I beg pardon, I quoted the noble Duke opposite, that the Ionians should be consulted on the cession.

EARL RUSSELL:—That is exactly what we are going to do. We mean to consult them. Moreover, this is a matter which also requires consideration from the other Powers. We shall say first to the Ionians "If you, on the meeting of your Parliament, to be convened for the purpose, shall declare (as once or twice they have irregularly done), that Greece being now an independent kingdom, we wish to belong to Greece;" then we shall consult the other Powers of Europe who were parties to the original treaty, as to what should be done, and whether, it being the wish of the Ionian Islands to be joined to Greece, they ought not to be so joined. If it is clearly the desire of the Islands, as it is very possible it may be, notwithstanding the symptoms that have from time to time been exhibited—if it is their desire to enjoy the benefits of the protection of Great Britain, which, I think, are very great, and which have much tended to their civilization; then one consequence of this will be, that we shall be free from the reproach which is cast upon us from every side—that while in every corner of Europe we profess such liberal principles, while we profess that Italy ought to be independent and free to control its own concerns, we coerce and oppress the Ionian Islanders, who wish to be released from our rule. These Islands being no dependency of the British Crown and no part of the British dominions, if they fairly and deliberately declare their desire for union with Greece, I maintain that be the advantages of our having a fortress in the Mediterranean what they may, it does not belong to the character of this great country to say that it will keep them in subjection, although they wish to be free and are entitled to be so. The noble Earl may laugh at this whole question if he likes; but I confess that to see two countries, to which such great recollections belong as Greece and Italy, rising again into freedom, independence, and happiness, is a great pleasure to me; and it would, I think, be a great glory to the Government of Great Britain to have contributed to such a result. This is not a new policy, but one that has been pursued by the statesmen of this country for generations. Our conduct in regard to Holland, Portugal, Greece and Belgium in past times bears evidence to the exertions of Great Britain towards the establishment of free and independent communities. That is our true policy; and the extension of our empire is not so valuable to us as this extension of free and independent nations, which, having the support of Great Britain, there is no chance of that single despotic dominion by which Europe has more than once been oppressed. Your Lordships will be better able to judge of these matters when you have read the papers which will be laid before you.

My Lords, if the noble Earl opposite and my noble friend behind me have been unable to go through this debate without paying some tribute to the memory of the late Marquess of Lansdowne, I feel that it is impossible for me, who had been so long connected with him in friendship and by political ties, to omit the mention of his name. The recollection of his life is one of no ordinary character. It is the recollection of a life pure, honoured, and respected—known to this House by combined wisdom, moderation, dignity, and courtesy—known to the public at large by the many services which he contributed to the legislation and the institutions of his country. My Lords, I hope that a spirit like his may preside over your Lordships' deliberations. His spirit was this, that while he dearly loved the Constitution, he was a friend to every improvement, every well-considered advance that could be made in our institutions. So that as a steadfast friend of the Constitution, that Constitution would never suffer in his hand, nor the cause of sound progress be impeded. When your Lordships consider the great measures that were passed in his time and by his assistance—measures which included every kind of religious or political question—questions affecting the rights of Protestant Dissenters, questions affecting the disabilities of the Roman Catholics or the emancipation of the Jews—when you look at the measures for free trade in corn, so deeply affecting the material interests of the community—when you look at the Reform Act, affecting the political power of the people in the country, I think you will find that the spirit which animated Lord Lansdowne is the spirit which ought to animate all who take part in political affairs. It has been a great mercy to England and the world that extreme changes have been made here in peace and tranquillity which in other countries would in all probability not have been effected without revolution. I think you will find that that is partly owing to the prevalence of the feelings and views entertained by the deceased statesman—feelings and views which were alike favourable to liberty and order, and which deserve the attention of mankind.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY:—My Lords, I need not say that I agree with the concluding words of the noble Earl with respect to the lamented nobleman who has been taken from us. I can only add my honest wish that when hereafter any noble Lord shall assume the leadership of this House he will remember the conduct of the Marquess of Lansdowne, and endeavour to imitate it as closely as possible. I will not trespass on your time, for it would be superfluous to say how sincerely I participate in the feelings of those who have already spoken with regard to the auspicious event which has been announced to us in the first part of the Speech from the Throne. Indeed, I should not have thought it necessary to address your Lordships at all but for some observations of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell) in answer to my noble Friend behind me. Before replying to those observations, allow me to express my approbation of the policy pursued by the noble Earl with reference to the affairs of America. I agree that we could not have recognised the Southern States without going further—bare recognition would have been utterly barren; it would not have been of the smallest use unless followed up by forcible intervention, and unless we had insisted upon the blockade being raised. But although I entirely agree in that part of the noble Earl's policy, I cannot go farther and agree with the noble Earl, or even with my noble Friend behind me, in thinking that the noble Earl pursued a right course with respect to the French proposal for mediation. I think it was our duty, as a Christian people, being of the same religion and the same blood, and speaking the same language as the Americans, to do whatever we possibly could to stop the dreadful struggle now going on among them, provided always that we neither risked our neutrality nor incurred dishonour. It is impossible to conceive, if you recollect what the proposition of the French Government was, what harm could have occurred to our Government by joining in their proposition. If it had succeeded, the credit of this country would have been lasting—it would have been a most creditable page in the history of this country; whereas, if it had failed—if the Northern States rejected the proposition even with insult—the attempt could have brought no detriment upon us. Even if it had been received with insult, we need care for no insult which does not bring dishonour with it, and this could not have brought dishonour, but the contrary. I do not feel convinced that it would not have succeeded—it is possible that the proposition might have done so; for it seems almost against common sense and probability to believe that in that great country, inhabited by millions, so sorely tried for two years by every misfortune by which men can be cursed, there are not hundreds of thousands composing a peace party who would be glad to obtain peace if they could get it with honour, and who would be glad to avail themselves of any reasonable excuse which saved their pride. However that may be, the attempt should have been made, and I regret that the noble Earl did not join in the French proposition. The Emperor has kept steadily to his purpose. Alone of his own accord, he has renewed his efforts to put a stop to the war. If he succeeds, he will have plucked from us one of the greatest opportunities we ever had for distinguishing the Government of this country. Before leaving the subject of America, I want to express my sincere hope, that although the noble Earl has been baffled, as I know he has, in treating with so extraordinary a body as the Government of the Northern States, he has endeavoured to stop, or at least mitigate, some of the horrors now going on in America. I have no doubt he has done so, and that the papers he is about to lay on the table will show that he has done so. But, without distressing your Lordships by any enumeration of the horrors of the war—horrors unparalleled even in the wars of barbarous nations—I should like to know whether the noble Earl has arrested one special kind of diabolical cruelty enacted by the Government of the United States. That Government has, contrary to all the common laws of war, contrary to all precedent, not excluding the most ignorant and barbarous ages, declared medicines and surgical instruments contraband of war, thereby, in plain English, enacting that nothing should be done to mitigate the sufferings or save the life of a wounded or dying enemy. So horrible a proceeding requires, I think, the publicly expressed condemnation of every civilized country in the world. I now come to that part of the noble Earl's speech in which he taunted my noble Friend behind me, who had, as I think very properly, reproved him for his officious advice given in all directions and on all occasions, with having done exactly the same thing himself. The noble Earl taunted my noble Friend with having been equally fidgety and fussy upon every occasion, and he quoted the advice given to the King of Naples and the Grand Duke of Tuscany in 1859, which advice, the noble Earl said, amounted to this:—The King and the Grand Duke were counselled not to involve themselves in the disputes between Piedmont, Austria, and France, but to remain quiet at home, governing their own subjects and not meddling with those of others. I do not recollect any such advice having been given to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, but I do recollect it having been given to the King of Naples; and if I were in the same position again, I should repeat that advice. It is sound advice to anybody to tell him to take care of his own business, and not meddle with that of others, especially when war is in question. But there is a very great difference between the advice recently given to the King of Denmark and the Pope by the noble Earl and that formerly given by the Government of which I was a member to the King of Naples. The difference is this:—The King of Naples asked for our advice; but I am not aware that either the King of Denmark or the Pope paid the same compliment to the noble Earl. We gave our advice, moreover, in the hope of forming a congress; and I hold it is not officious to attempt to constitute a European conference for the amelioration of Governments, as we did for Italy. There is then a great difference between the advice given by the noble Earl to the King of Denmark and the advice given by us to the King of Naples. But the advice given by the noble Earl to the King of Denmark was not only not asked for, but it was of a very surprising character, for it was the exact contrary of the advice he had given to the King of Denmark before. In 1860 and 1861 the noble Earl, in his despatches, pronounced Schleswig to be a Danish duchy; he stated that the German Confederation had no right to interfere in its administration; but in his recent despatch he recommended alterations which, in fact, would Germanize Denmark and establish the Government of the country at Frankfort instead of at Copenhagen. The noble Earl's scheme would have given an inadequate representation to Denmark proper. [Earl RUSSELL: I never advised anything of the sort.] Not in so many words; but the noble Earl sided with the Germans, who wished to abrogate the old charter, and to enforce a policy the result of which would be, by giving the same number of members to the German provinces, which contain 80,000 inhabitants, as to Denmark proper, which contains 1,600,000, to place the Government of Denmark at Frankfort. However, I do not wish to weary your Lordships with this bête noire the Danish Question, the terror of which, as you may be aware, has already sufficed more than once to disperse the other House. I will only say, that even if I agreed to every statement in the noble Earl's despatch, I should object to the style of it. Denmark is an ancient State, more ancient than our own, for its kings have sat on our throne of England. It is an honourable one, too, for it has maintained its independence for centuries. Such a kingdom, small as it is, ought to be treated with deference, and I say that is what the noble Earl has failed to do. The noble Earl's intentions may be good, but his pen sometimes gets the better of his judgment, and I think it did so when he wrote his despatch on this question. He appears not to possess that sort of moral thermometer by which he is able to ascertain the temperature at which a despatch of advice or remonstrance can be written without offence. He addresses Denmark just as if it were a vassal of England instead of an independent State. Surely, too, the noble Earl forgot himself in his recent communications with the Pope. It may be quite true that His Holiness is unpopular at Rome. But suppose this case:—The noble Duke, for example, who is at the head of the Admiralty, possesses, as one of the emoluments of his office, a handsome house at Whitehall—God forbid that I should compare its architecture to that of the Vatican, any more than that I should say he was as unpopular in the navy as the Pope is in Italy—but assuming he were so, and any kind friend were to say to the noble Duke, "Leave the Admiralty, and I will find you a spare room where you will be free from the cares of office, and I will send my carriage to fetch you," would not the noble Duke answer just as the Pope did, "I don't know what trials Providence has in store for me, but for the present I have no apprehensions, and prefer to stay where I am"? As to the Greek question, I have been very much astonished at the course which the Government has taken. My noble Friend near me (the Earl of Derby) has, I think, placed the Government on the horns of a very awkward dilemma. If the diplomatic contract which existed prevented the acceptance of the throne of Greece by Prince Alfred, the Government should immediately have made it known that such was the case. Having looked at the protocol, I maintain that it is as good now as ever, and I cannot conceive how Russia could dispute it.

EARL RUSSELL: Russia disputed not the binding nature of the protocol, but its application to the Duke of Leuchtenburg.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: We heard a good deal not long since about bubble bets. It seems to me that in Greece there was a "bubble" election, because Her Majesty's Government never intended that Prince Alfred should accept the crown. I think such a proceeding was most disrespectful to the Prince and the Royal Family, and it was undoubtedly cruel to the Greek people. Every day of delay in forming a solid and permanent Government in that country is an additional day of anarchy. Up to this time the people have behaved very well, and have obeyed their provisional Government; but I have received reliable information that disorder is beginning to appear, and that brigandage is gaining ground; so that if this question be not very quickly settled, it is impossible to say what may be the result. By their finessing Her Majesty's Government have postponed the settlement of Greece, and will therefore be responsible for any misfortune which may ensue. I am also very much surprised at the cession of the Ionian Islands. The noble Earl tells us he is giving them up because, as I did not know before, we have been taunted with holding the Protectorate for selfish ends. If the noble Earl is so susceptible, there is no saying where he will stop. He may shortly find that similar taunts are applied to our occupation of Gibraltar or Malta, and may find it necessary to vindicate the purity of our character in the same way. There are some persons who insist that Corfu is of no use to us. I say that is a mistake—it is an important harbour and fortress, and the key of the Adriatic. But Corfu cannot be defended by the Greeks—the whole Greek army would be insufficient to hold the fortifications of that port; and even if they could, I doubt whether in the event of a European war they would defend it. The result would be, that when hostilities broke out, it would be seized by France or Russia. I trust that the Government will inquire as to the value of Corfu of some of the veterans who took part in the naval operations in the Adriatic, under Sir W. Hoste. Some of his captains are still living. I am certain they would support the view I take, and that they would strongly deprecate our giving it up. And I see no reason why, because the noble Earl and his predecessors have mismanaged the Ionian Islands, they should now be abandoned.

EARL GREY said, there were two points in the speech of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury) on which he so entirely differed from him that he desired to address a few observations to those subjects. The noble Earl had expressed regret that Her Majesty's Ministers had not concurred with France in offering their good offices to America for the purpose of terminating the existing war in that country. He could not share in that regret; he felt as strongly as any noble Lord in that House a desire for the cessation of that horrible warfare; but he asked, did any one believe that the tender of the good offices of France and England at that time would have contributed to bring the war to a close? It had been well observed by the noble Earl who followed the Proposer and Seconder of the Address, that before an accommodation could be recommended, the principle on which it was to be proposed must be determined upon. The South insisted on independence, and the North on the re-establishment of the Union; and he thought that their Lordships would feel that some months ago, when the proposal from France was received, it would have been worse than useless to advise the contending parties to agree to either principle. If an accommodation had been proposed on the assumption that the re-establishment of the Union was impossible, the Government of the Northern States might well have complained of the exertion, on the part of this country, of a moral power against them; and if, on the other hand, mediation had been offered on the basis of the re-establishment of the Union, then they would have proposed what he concurred with every noble Lord who had spoken in thinking was absolutely impracticable. There could, he thought, exist little doubt, that if we had so interfered, we should, instead of doing good, only have further irritated those already too much irritated against this country. The other question on which he desired to express an opinion was with reference to the Ionian Islands. It was a question of very great importance; and, much to his surprise, it had been implied by a noble Earl opposite that there was some foundation in the objection popularly taken to the course pursued by the Government, on the ground that the Government had not waited for the concurrence of Parliament before it had proposed the transfer of those Islands to Greece. The Ionian Islands were neither in fact nor technically part of the British dominions; but could there be any doubt, even supposing that the Islands really formed part of the foreign dominions of the Crown, that the Crown possessed the constitutional power of ceding them to a foreign nation? He said nothing as to the advisability of such a course. All negotiations and conclusions of treaties rested with the Crown; if the Crown abused its authority, the advisers of the Crown were responsible, and were liable to the censure of Parliament, and even to impeachment, if they advised the Crown to adopt measures injurious to the empire. There were precedents of cessations made by treaty. The magnificent island of Java was thus ceded, and injudiciously in his opinion, but he believed that in respect to that transaction it never was asserted that the authority of the Crown was overstepped. There was, therefore, nothing unconstitutional or irregular in the course pursued with respect to the Ionian Islands. And he would go further, and say that, in his opinion, the measure was not only right in form but right in substance, and, instead of deserving censure for the proposed arrangement, the Government were entitled to praise. It had been said that the Ionian Islands were extremely valuable, especially in time of war. He certainly did not know how they could be valuable to this country in time of peace, for England drew no tribute from them, but, on the contrary, expended a considerable sum of money on them. The trade with them was not very large, but that would go on just as well if the Ionian Islands were given up to-morrow. With regard to the importance of the Islands in time of war, much stress had been laid upon the experience of the last great war with France, and in the opinion said to have been expressed by Sir William Hoste, that the possession of Corfu would have been then of more value to him than the best frigate in his squadron. He could perfectly well understand that this might have been a sound opinion with reference to the circumstances of those times; but their Lordships must remember that this was before the invention of steam, and Italy was then occupied by a French army, to which the population was generally hostile, and against which we were carrying on operations by harassing attacks upon the coast. With reference to these attacks, and when, from not being in possession of steam-power, it was important to be able to obtain supplies for our ships from various quarters, the possession of Corfu would obviously have been of great value; but circumstances were now entirely changed. He hoped and believed that Italy was now about to become a great and powerful nation, and was not likely to be again occupied by French armies in the same manner as it had before been, nor was there a prospect of gigantic hostilities like those carried on during the great Revolutionary War. One station in the Mediterranean was quite sufficient for our purposes; and looking at all the circumstances, he thought it obvious that Malta should be that one. Instead of being an advantage to this country during war, he was persuaded that the possession of the Ionian Islands would be a source of difficulty and danger. In the first place, they would require a garrison of certainly not less than 10,000 men; and with our army, which always had been and always must be numerically small as compared to those of the great military Powers of the Continent, to have 10,000 men taken away to garrison a port like this would be a great inconvenience. But even 10,000 men, if we were at war with these great Powers, would not be safe without the constant support of a naval force; without this they would be liable at any moment to be attacked by a superior force, which it would be impossible for them to resist, especially if the population were unfriendly. To guard against our suffering so heavy a blow, we should therefore be compelled always to keep our fleet within reach of these islands for their protection if required, and the necessity of affording this protection would obviously cripple and hamper the movements of our Mediterranean fleet in other operations that might be wanted. There was another view of this question in which he concurred with his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary. He agreed with the noble Earl that the Ionian Islands had been given to us for their benefit, and not for ours; and it would do much damage to the reputation of this country if we allowed it to be supposed that we insisted on retaining the Protectorate, not for their advantage but for our own selfish objects. Again, he concurred with the Government in thinking the moment most happily chosen for offering a surrender of that Protectorate. He did not think it would have been consistent with our obligations to surrender it during the existence of the late Government in Greece, which had failed in fulfilling the objects for which it had been called into existence; but when a fitting opportunity presented itself, he believed we were doing what was right in offering no obstacle to another arrangement. We accepted the Protectorate under a treaty by which we were bound to give the Ionian Islands a constitutional Government; but such a Government could not work in any country without the consent of the people, and in spite of all our endeavours to conciliate the people of the Ionian Islands—and he did not know what more we could have done for them—such was their attitude towards the protecting Power, that though a constitution existed in the country, it was set aside year after year. Session after session Parliament met in those Islands, but did nothing. It met and declared its intention to have the Islands annexed to Greece. It was then prorogued, and the Government was carried on by provisional acts of the Senate; that is, virtually by the arbitrary authority of the Lord High Commissioner. This for several years had been the regular march of events. He believed that of late the Ionian Parliament had sat somewhat longer and done somewhat more than a few years ago, but it still refused fairly to co-operate with the British authorities, and, substantially, we had failed in our endeavours to give the people the benefits of constitutional government. The most necessary functions of government were thus in abeyance; and though the Ionian Islands were under a system of law which was positively preposterous, and which the British Government was most anxious to amend, in consequence of the deadlock between the protecting Power and the representatives of the country, none of those reforms or improvements which were necessary for the development of the natural resources of the country could be accomplished. The continuance of such a state of things was not creditable to this country; and when there was an opportunity of withdrawing from a position of such embarrassment, in his opinion Her Majesty's Government had judged wisely in resolving to avail themselves of the occasion.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that the noble Earl who had just sat down (Earl Grey) had taken exception to the speech of his noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury) on two points. One of these points was the expression of regret that Her Majesty's Government had not joined the Emperor of the French in offering mediation between the contending parties in the United States. This, however, was a past transaction which might be made subject of discussion, but which no criticism now offered could alter or modify. The second point to which the noble Earl took exception was in a different position—the cession of the Ionian Islands to Greece. As these Islands had not yet wholly passed out of our possession, and as it might be possible to bring Her Majesty's Government to review the circumstances under which they had made the offer to cede our Protectorate, he should say a few words in answer to some of the observations of the noble Earl. He was not one of those who at all times and under all circumstances would object to any modification of our position in respect of these Islands, or even to a surrender of the Protectorate; but he contended that either a modification or a cession ought to be considered in connection with the time and circumstances under which it was proposed. That point, however, was one which had been entirely overlooked by the noble Lord opposite who had spoken on the subject. For his own part he had failed to ascertain from the speech of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell) what were the precise grounds upon which this cession was justified. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) justified it upon military grounds, upon the temper of the islanders, and upon political considerations. As to the former of these, though it might be said on the one side that steam communication had altered the conditions which made the possession of these Islands desirable, it might also be alleged on the other side that this very steam communication, rendering a greater number of coal depôts necessary than heretofore, added to the importance of these Islands to this country. As to financial considerations, he should be the last to object to any sound and effective economy; but the cession of dependencies of the British Crown was a very rough-and-ready mode of practising economy. Where was such a principle to stop? Malta, Gibraltar, and India cost money. Was economy to be carried out by the cession of these dependencies? Moreover, the Government were bound to show why they gave this priority to the Ionian Islands over half-a-dozen other places, where we were possibly spending quite as much money and getting less in return. Then there were the political considerations which had been spoken of. He observed that this step was called a "gift." But the Ionian Islands were not ours to "give," for we had neither conquered them nor inherited them, and he doubted whether it was competent for us to "give" away that which had been well defined by his noble Friend as a territory confided as a trust to our guardianship. No doubt a trust might be resigned, but it must be resigned into the hands from which we had received it; and, if alienated, it must be alienated with the consent of our co-trustees. The Treaty of Paris stipulated that they should remain a single, free, and independent Kingdom. If they were ceded to Greece, they might be free, but they would certainly not be independent. Then as to the time at which this "gift" had been proposed. At this moment Greece was neither a monarchy nor a republic, but a vague, indefinite phantom, which had no existence in the councils of Europe. He admitted that by their recent moderation and good order the Greeks gave hopeful promise for the future; but he confessed that he could not understand the precipitancy of the Government in what they admitted to be so weighty and important a matter. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) said that the consent of Parliament to the cession was not necessary, and perhaps technically this was so. But of all men he should have thought that the noble Earl would have been the last to dispute the right of Parliament to consider this question or the propriety of such a course. He asked, what was the real value of this gift to the Greeks themselves? If, indeed, we could give to Greece, along with the Ionian Islands, Epirus, Thessaly, Albania, Candia, and other territory adjacent, the gift would be one worth having. But four years ago, when this question was mooted, the most moderate politicians of Athens were far from desiring the annexation of the Ionian Islands, seeing in it the annexation of Greece to the Islands rather than that of the Islands to Greece; for the islanders had held out threats, that if the annexation took place, they would revolutionize the dynasty and the constitution. Then was this measure palatable even to the inhabitants themselves? Mr. Gladstone formed the opinion that the wealthy and respectable islanders were afraid of annexation to Greece. Turkey, also, would not view with complacency the aggrandisement of this aggressive neighbour. She could hardly desire to see the Greek power extending itself on her western flank and threatening Albania. The fact was, that in making this proposal the Government were dealing with a mere fragment of the Eastern question, and, instead of advancing the solution of that question, were laying the foundation of still further complications. He could not separate this question from the question of the election to the Crown of Greece. It was clear that the noble Earl had given a certain sanction to the candidature of Prince Alfred, when he knew that by treaties which were still in existence, and binding upon us, any such candidature was forbidden. Was it right for the British Government to bring forward an English Prince in such a manner as to make their support or withdrawal of him a matter dependent upon circumstances? The people most entitled to complain of the conduct of the Government was the Greek people, who were at first led to believe that an English Prince was a possible Sovereign for them, and a month was allowed to elapse and an election to take place before any doubt was thrown upon such a possibility. When Prince Alfred was withdrawn, the British Government recommended the King of Portugal, but took no previous steps to ascertain whether the King would accept the dignity if offered to him. Again were the Greeks disappointed; and now a third time, when it appeared that the Duke of Saxe-Coburg was disinclined to mount the vacant Throne. He could not help thinking that by the course they had pursued the Government had been trifling with a grave question, and had given the Greek people great reason for complaint.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he did not think the noble Earl who had just sat down had dealt quite fairly with the arguments of his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who had contended, that inasmuch as this country held the Ionian Islands as a trust, we ought not to continue to hold them when we could no longer discharge that trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of those Islands. There was a great difference between our tenure of those Islands and that by which our other possessions abroad were held. The Ionian Islands were, in fact, a free State under the protection of Great Britain, and therefore it was competent and right for the Government to take steps to get relieved from their trust when they could no longer execute it satisfactorily. The noble Earl had objected to the time at which the cession was proposed, but that really was a point upon which the Government were entitled to credit. For himself, he thought that so far from the time chosen for making the offer being inopportune, it had been very wisely and appropriately chosen. While the Government of Greece was unsatisfactory, the transfer could not be made, but when a change took place, and a Government was formed that was likely to be more stable, the British Government wisely lost no time in making it known, that when the new Sovereign should be elected, they would give up the Ionian Islands to Greece. The consent of the other Powers who were parties to the Treaty of 1815 must be obtained; but he understood his noble Friend the Secretary of State to say that that assent was reserved, and that all arrangements must be subject to its being obtained. He therefore saw no ground for impugning the conduct of the Government in respect to Greece. But there was one question upon which he did not quite agree with the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He regretted that his noble Friend should have used such strong language respecting the relations between Schleswig and Denmark, as that contained in the despatch which had been referred to that evening. So strong a statement could not fail to increase the difficulties—already very severe—of the Danish Government in dealing with that complicated question. Of course, there could be no objection to proposing friendly arrangement for the solution of these difficulties, if any such had appeared feasible; but the noble Earl should have remembered that Schleswig was in a different position as regarded Germany from Holstein and Lauenberg, and should have been careful not to give a colour to the suggestion that, in the opinion of the British Government, Germany was entitled to the possession of Schleswig. The only other point to which he need refer was that of the United States, and he should do so simply to express his opinion that the Government were well advised in not interfering in the contest now raging in that country.

THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS' SPEECH.

MR. SPEAKER reported, That the House had been at the House of Peers at the desire of the Lords Commissioners appointed under the Great Seal for opening and holding this present Parliament; and that the Lord High Chancellor, being one of the said Commissioners, made a Speech to both Houses of Parliament, of which Mr. Speaker said he had, for greater accuracy, obtained a copy; which he read to the House.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY ON THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS' SPEECH.

MR. CALTHORPE rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty in reply to Her Most Gracious Majesty's Speech. The hon. Member said, that although the Government of this country was a popular and constitutional one, it could not be doubted that the personal character of the Sovereign exercised a most important influence upon the country; and in no instance had that influence been more deeply felt or widely extended than during the beneficent reign of Her present Majesty. Under these circumstances, looking to the fact that in the course of nature they might expect at some future period—which he prayed might be a remote one—His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales would sit on the throne of this country, he thought that it was the duty of the House, upon what might be termed the commencement of his public career—His Royal Highness having this day taken his seat in the House of Peers—and also upon the occasion of so important a step as the marriage of His Royal Highness, which was an event of the highest consequence in the life of any man, whatever might be his rank in society, to offer their congratulations to Her Majesty, with a renewed expression of their loyalty and good-will. When, moreover, all had heard of the beauty and the winning grace of the Royal lady whom His Royal Highness had chosen for his bride, and knew that it was a union which was not the result of dynastic motives or political consideration, but was founded on mutual affection, arising from an intimate knowledge of each other, he thought they might look forward with confidence to the future and lasting happiness of the Royal couple. Then there was another member of the Royal Family to whom the Greek nation had offered their crown. When we recollected that only seven or eight years ago we, in concert with our allies the French, occupied the Piræus, that at that time Russian influence was paramount at Athens, that we had always been the staunch ally of that Power which the Greeks regarded as their mortal enemy and old oppressor, and had always sternly opposed any aggressive extension of their frontier, the unanimous election of Prince Alfred to the Greek throne could only be attributed to the appreciation of the personal character of Her Majesty, to a desire to compliment the gallant Prince her son, and to a conviction that a constitutional system, as it worked in this country, was most conducive to personal liberty and to the material progress of a nation. They were informed in Her Majesty's Speech of the reasons which had induced the Prince to decline that offer. It was not for him to express any opinion of the reasons which had induced Her Majesty's Ministers to give the advice that the offer should be refused; but he might state, that one result of the events which had taken place in Greece was, that the British Government had proposed the cession of the Ionian Islands to the Greek nation. The intelligence and mercantile energy of the Greeks were so great that he had no doubt, that if they could only obtain the services of a chief of ability and of honest purpose, and, following the example of Piedmont under the guidance of Count Cavour, would turn their attention to the internal improvement of their country, they might yet become one of the most prosperous countries in Europe. To such a people the addition of a territory containing a population of 230,000, speaking a common language and sprung from the same race, with the territory of the Seven Islands, could not fail to be of most material advantage. Individually, he congratulated the Government upon having taken the first opportunity of relieving this country from a reproach which had of late years been frequent in the mouths of our enemies. Since the revolution of July we had always maintained the principle that the governed had a right in the choice of their rulers; but of late years, whenever we had given our moral support to those who were carrying out this principle, we had been met by the sneering reply, "Why, the very Representative Assembly which you gave to the Ionian Islands have repeatedly voted for their annexation to Greece and their release from your yoke, and yet you have refused to comply with their wishes." That this reproach was unmerited there could be no doubt. We were not in the ordinary position of ruler and governed. We had been placed in these Islands by the great Powers of Europe as their Protectors; but if the great Powers would consent, he hoped that the Government would adhere to their expressed intentions, and would concur in the wishes of the Ionians. He believed that this proposal had been a successful stroke of English diplomacy, because our detractors could only say of what was an act of justice that it was a whimsical fit of generosity.

Some months ago a dark cloud of famine lowered over the heads of half a million of the most industrious of Her Majesty's subjects. How that cloud had been lightened, not only by the brilliant generosity of the people of this country, but also by profuse contributions from Her Majesty's subjects in all parts of the world, was well known. From every colony, however distant, from every people, however remote, from all races and from the members of all sects of religion, wherever the flag of England waved, there had come substantial aid and assistance. We had also to acknowledge with thankfulness the munificent offering which was now on its way to these shores from the Northern States of America. It was a cheering sign that, at a moment when the Northern press and Northern politicians were displaying a pettish and almost childish hostility to this country, there were to be found many Americans who, in the midst of their financial difficulties, and with their hearts torn by the dreadful carnage in their armies, in the midst of all the sufferings they were enduring, could feel sympathy with, and offer assistance to, those of our people who were suffering from no fault of their own. The suffering operatives themselves had, by their patient endurance and their law-respecting resignation, proved to the world the signal advantages of extended education, cheap literature, and the complete absence of any real political grievance.

The Speech from the Throne informed us that, notwithstanding the distress which prevailed in the manufacturing districts, the state of the revenue was not unsatisfactory. He took that to mean, not only that there was no deficit, but that there might be a surplus, and he trusted that he was not out of order in expressing a hope, that should that be the case, and should a reduction of the Estimates be possible, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take into consideration the weight with which the income tax pressed upon the poorer portion of the middle classes. That in a year during the whole of which half a million of people had been out of employment, and during five months of which they had been on the verge of starvation, the revenue should be pronounced to be in a state not unsatisfactory was a proof of the buoyancy and elasticity of our resources. He should think that even the opponents of the commercial treaty with France must admit at least that the moment of its conclusion was opportune, for by its action and by its action alone had the deficit which must have resulted from the paralysis of our trade with America been made up and supplied. If the commercial treaty with Belgium only had the same success as had attended that concluded with France, the advantages of which would, he believed, be materially extended in future years, we might fairly say that we had before us a prospect of sound prosperity.

He cordially supported Her Majesty's Government in their determination to adhere to a policy of non-intervention in America. He could understand that at any period of last year they might have been induced to join the Imperial Government of France in proposals of mediation; but after the 1st of January of this year, the day on which the proclamation of freedom to the negroes was issued by Mr. Lincoln, he thought that no Government of this country would have ventured to interfere. It might be said that Mr. Lincoln proclaimed freedom to the slaves over whom he had no control, and that those who were in his power he rather consigned to slavery than attempted to free. But in this he believed that Mr. Lincoln had remained strictly within the Constitution. As President of a great federation of States, he had no power to act against any institution in those States; but as Commander-in-Chief he had a right to adopt any measure which might tend to the complete discomfiture and discouragement of those whom he regarded as rebels. Hence this proclamation must be regarded as a military expedient, and not as the result of any moral obligation to the cause of freedom, which of course would operate to the liberation of all slaves in all the States of America. It was also true that the proclamation had not been issued till other means had failed, and was not prompted by a strong feeling against slavery in the North. Indeed, it seemed as if the majority of Northern Americans were indifferent, or at least not unfavourable, to the continuance of slavery; and unless the proclamation exercised a most important effect during the remaining two years of Mr. Lincoln's presidential office, the Democrats, on coming into power, would probably make peace with the Southerners on any conditions they liked to impose. Still the great fact remained that freedom had been proclaimed to millions of black men by the President elected by 30,000,000 of whites. It was difficult not to entertain some feeling of contempt for the Federal Government, for they had brought into disrepute the great principle of self-government. Grosser extravagance, more corruption, and speculations to a larger amount, had been permitted by them than were ever before seen in the world. They had committed frequent violations of personal liberty, of freedom of speech, and of the freedom of the press. They had exhibited to the world a financial system so reckless, so desperate, that it would be ludicrous if it had not involved the most disastrous consequences. But the worst feature of all displayed by the Northerners was the abject moral cowardice of the well-informed classes. From the letter published in connection with the New York State election it was known that at the commencement of the war General Scott counselled a peaceable separation; and from other sources—especially from that self-evidently truthful book of Mr. Russell's—they learnt that these men, who in any other country but the United States would have exercised a commanding influence—statesmen, diplomats, historians, literary and scientific men, and travellers, nay, even Members of President Lincoln's own Cabinet—would gladly have consented to a peaceable separation. Ought not people in this country to believe, or at least to hope, that the most respectable portion of the Abolitionists would gladly wash their hands of the sin and crime of a connection with slavery? And yet throughout the whole country there was not found one man with moral courage enough to stand up and attempt to stem the torrent of popular lust of power—not one who dared to come forward in the hope of softening, reasoning with, or calming the popular frenzy of the moment. Indeed, it seemed as if no American ventured on any public platform who was not prepared to advocate the most extreme opinions in the most violent and virulent language. On the other hand, it was impossible not to feel admiration for the unanimity and patriotism shown by the Southerners, for the dauntless courage and patient endurance of their troops, the consummate generalship and brilliant strategy of their superior officers. Neither had their civil administration nor their fertility of resources proved inferior to their military exploits. The knowledge that they personally were not answerable for the detestable institution of slavery had likewise its share in the sympathy aroused by their deeds. They inherited that institution—they did not originate it—they were born to it; and the result of the meeting of the bishops and clergy lately held made manifest what moral obliquity of vision must be induced by constant intercourse with slavery. Neither was England quite faultless in this matter. Though she had done much for the repression of slavery and the slave trade, and she expended £20,000,000 in the manumission of her own slaves, her people eighteen years ago were such energetic free-traders that, in order to render their free-trade policy symmetrical, they abolished the differential duty upon slave-grown sugar, and thereby gave a fillip to that very slave trade which they were spending a million annually, besides valuable lives, to check by the squadron in the West Indies. It might be said that it was hard on the Southerners that they should be continuously deprived of their means of living. It was hard, no doubt; but in all countries in a state of transition there must be suffering and misery; and how much harder were the sufferings of the slaves, how many generations had gone through similar treatment; and if the system were not terminated, how hard would be the sufferings of generations yet unborn! For years the philanthropists of Europe and America had been racking their brains to discover some solution of this vast problem, but they had always been beaten by numbers. How were they ever to buy up 4,000,000 souls? A means at last offered itself unexpectedly. Already more than 100,000 slaves had escaped, and they were told the other day that planters in exposed positions, such as the coast, and banks of navigable rivers, were entering into pecuniary bargains with their labourers. Remembering what the United States were only three years ago, the warm hospitality which they extended to the unfortunate and oppressed of all nations, and that in their population was to be found a larger proportion of prosperous, educated, happy, and contented human beings, enjoying a larger amount of personal independence and personal freedom—of a certain sort—than was to be found in any other country of the world, those who believed in the beneficent acts of an all-merciful Providence were at a loss to account for the infliction of evils so grievous, of miseries so monstrous, as those brought upon that unhappy country by the civil war, unless it were to work out and develop the deliverance and redemption of a race which had suffered so horribly as the negro. The proclamation of President Lincoln was not addressed only to the slaves of the Southern States. Its influence would extend beyond the bounds of the United States. There were three great slave-holding Powers in the world—Brazil, Spain, and the Southern States. It was useless to argue with either of the smaller Powers as long as a nation either of 30,000,000 or of 8,000,000 kept 4,000,000 negroes in bondage. But if President Lincoln's proclamation had the effect of liberating these unhappy beings, he believed ten years would not elapse till Spain and Brazil would cease to be slave-holding countries. In the midst of diverging opinions and conflicting arguments, of reasons based on the same premisses, but arriving at different conclusions, through the chaos of hopes and fears, they still saw shining with steadfast brilliancy the sacred light of human freedom, and the hope of moral elevation for that race which hitherto had been treated as accursed. He had attempted to advocate a great cause, which he believed was the real—though, possibly, the indirect—origin of this war; and he felt convinced that that the good sense and right feeling of the people of England would always prevent any Government from attempting to interfere with or counteract the possible—and, he hoped, the probable—effect of such a proclamation. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to thank Her Majesty for the most gracious Speech delivered by Her Command to both Houses of Parliament :

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that She has declared Her consent to a Marriage between His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Her Royal Highness the Princess Alexandra, daughter of Prince Christian of Denmark ; and for commanding that the Treaty which has been concluded thereupon with the King of Denmark should be laid before us :

“Humbly to express to Her Majesty our full participation in Her sentiments on an event so interesting to Her Majesty, and which, with the blessing of God, will, we trust, prove so conducive to the happiness of Her family, and the welfare of Her people ; and to assure Her Majesty that we will make provision for such an establishment as may be thought suitable to the rank and dignity of the Heir Apparent to the Crown of these Realms :

“Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we cannot fail to be highly gratified and deeply to feel the unsolicited and spontaneous manifestation of goodwill towards Her Majesty and Her family, and of a due appreciation of the benefits conferred by the principles and practice of the British Constitution, which has led the Greek Nation to express so strong a desire that Her Majesty's son, Prince Alfred, should accept the Greek Crown :

“To thank Her Majesty for informing us that the diplomatic engagements of Her Majesty's Crown, together with other weighty considerations, have prevented Her Majesty from yielding to this general wish of the Greek Nation :

“To assure Her Majesty that with Her we trust that the same principles of choice which led the Greek Nation to direct their thoughts, in the first instance, towards His Royal Highness Prince Alfred, may guide them to the selection of a Sovereign under whose sway the Kingdom of Greece may enjoy the blessings of internal prosperity and of peaceful relations with other States ; and to express our thanks to Her Majesty for informing us that if, in such a state of things, the Republic of the Seven Islands should declare a deliberate wish to be united to the Kingdom of Greece, Her Majesty would be prepared to take such steps as may be necessary for a revision of the Treaty of November 1815, by which that Republic was reconstituted, and was placed under the protection of the British Crown :

“Humbly to express the gratification with which we learn that Her Majesty's relations with Foreign Powers continue to be friendly and satisfactory :

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that She has abstained from taking any step with a view to induce a cessation of the conflict between the contending parties in the North American States, because it has not yet seemed to Her Majesty that any such overtures could be attended with a probability of success :

“To assure Her Majesty that we share in the concern with which She has viewed the desolating warfare which still rages in those regions, and in the heartfelt grief with which She has witnessed the severe distress and suffering which that War has inflicted upon a large class of Her Majesty's Subjects, but which have been borne by them with noble fortitude and with exemplary resignation ; that we trust with Her Majesty that this suffering and this distress are rather diminishing than increasing, and that some revival of employment is beginning to take place in the manufacturing districts :

“To express to Her Majesty our deep gratification at the abundant generosity with which all classes of Her Subjects in all parts of Her Empire have contributed to relieve the wants of their suffering fellow-countrymen, and the liberality with which Her Majesty's Colonial Subjects have on this occasion given their aid, proving that, although their dwelling-places are far away, their hearts are still warm with unabated affection for the land of their Fathers ; and to convey to Her Majesty our sense of the value of the constant and laborious attention with which the Relief Committees have superintended the distribution of the Funds intrusted to their charge :

“Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that She has concluded with the King of the Belgians a Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, and a Convention respecting Joint Stock Companies, and for directing that Treaty and Convention to be laid before us ; together with Papers relating to the Affairs of Italy, of Greece, and of Denmark, and to occurrences which have lately taken place in Japan :

"To thank Her Majesty for having directed the Estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before us:

"To express our satisfaction at learning that notwithstanding the continuance of the Civil War in North America the general commerce of the country during the past year has not sensibly diminished; that the Treaty of Commerce which Her Majesty concluded with the Emperor of the French has already been productive of results highly advantageous to both the nations to which it applies; and that the general state of the Revenue, notwithstanding many unfavourable circumstances, has not been unsatisfactory:

"That with Her Majesty we trust that these results may be taken as proofs that the productive resources of the country are unimpaired:

"To convey to Her Majesty the expression of our deep gratification at the spirit of order which happily prevails throughout Her Dominions, and which is so essential an element in the well-being and prosperity of nations:

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we will give our most serious attention to the various measures of public usefulness and improvement which may be submitted for our consideration, and that with Her Majesty we fervently pray that the blessing of Almighty God may attend our deliberations and guide them to the promotion of the welfare and happiness of Her people."

MR. BAZLEY: Sir, in seconding the Address, which has been proposed in answer to Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, I am exceedingly glad of the opportunity afforded for expressing my satisfaction at the general feeling and sentiments displayed in that Speech. We have in it the satisfactory intelligence that we are at peace with all nations, a blessing which I hope may be long continued to us; and it is most gratifying not only to the Legislature, but I believe also to the people of the United Kingdom, that the Prince of Wales is about to form that happy connection which, whilst it secures his own happiness, and will add to the happiness of his Family, has secured the approbation of the country. I believe that His Royal Highness is the worthy son of a worthy sire, and I do not doubt that he will be a solace to the illustrious parent who is spared to him, and an honour to his country.

In common with every feeling man, I deplore the grievous calamity that has befallen our brethren on the other side of the Atlantic, where the grievous spectacle is witnessed of brother meeting brother in mortal combat. I wish I could see any prospect of an early termination of that fatal strife. On the contrary, the war, for all I can see, may be continued for a long period, and its continuance cannot fail to be attended by a prolongation of the distress in our own manufacturing districts. The sufferings of the people there have been very acute, but they have borne them with loyalty and resignation; but deep as has been their distress, and much as they long for the restoration of peace, they are still firm in their desire that their labour should not be renewed with material which is the produce of slave labour. The consequences of the struggle between the Northern and the Southern States have fallen upon us in two ways—first, by the loss of the raw material; and, secondly, by the closing of a great market for our manufactured products. We must now, therefore, look not only for new fields of supply for our raw material, but also for new markets in which to vend our products. The distressed operatives of the manufacturing districts have received the kind sympathies not only of their own countrymen, but of every people on the face of the earth. We have had substantial assistance afforded to us from every part of the United Kingdom. I have received important information from Mr. Farnall, the Poor Law Commissioner, on the subject of the prevailing distress, with which I will not trouble the House, as I have received more recent information from Mr. M'Clure, the Hon. Secretary of the Relief Committee. It appears that in the week ending January last—that is, a few days ago—the guardians of 147 unions in the manufacturing districts were affording relief to the amount of £15,612, which was distributed among 221,045 persons. From the Relief Fund during the same week the sum of £39,474 was expended in the relief of 374,630 persons. The total relief was therefore £55,086, which was distributed among 595,675 persons. The total contributions from all sources—the spontaneous contributions of the people of the United Kingdom, of the colonies, and of foreign countries up to the end of January—amounted to the large sum of £760,692. It is quite true that the cotton operatives have been slightly better employed of late but I fear that there is no possibility of any improvement at present to any great extent. I regret, too, that the distress is increasing to a lamentable extent among the class of small tradesmen, and other classes who have not hitherto received assistance from the Relief Fund. The fact is, that for the last two years a large portion of the people of the manufacturing districts have been living upon their capital. The workpeople have been compelled to part with their furniture and their clothing, and both they and the middle class of tradesmen have, little by little, exhausted all the means they possessed, so that the provident and the improvident have sunk to the same common condition of distress and destitution. The Savings Bank of Manchester is principally resorted to by domestic servants and other classes than those employed in the cotton trade, and does not therefore afford a fair criterion of the distress among the operatives. The cotton operatives are for the most part spirited individuals who look to building clubs as a more eligible investment, who save money with a view of commencing some little business, and who would not accept the low rate of interest of the savings banks. The distressed labouring classes are now asking for a supply of the raw material; they do not want charity; they only ask for the means of prosecuting their labours and obtaining a subsistence for themselves. I trust that the Government will do something to obtain from our vast colonies an increased supply of cotton. There are many colonial dependencies from which it might be obtained—Australia, the British West and East Indies—and I trust that a year or two will put us in possession of a largely increased supply. There is a prospect of a sufficient supply of cotton being obtained to enable the operatives to work half-time during the ensuing year; but it must be remembered that the inferiority of Indian cotton is so great, that even if they work half-time, the operatives will not be able to earn more than one-third their usual wages. I trust that the producers of East Indian cotton and the authorities of India will be induced to exert themselves, not only for the benefit of the ryot, but of the labouring classes of Lancashire. I may be permitted to refer to the great difference between our cotton trade in 1860 and that in last year. The exports of cotton to all parts of the world were in 1860 £56,000,000 sterling, while last year they only reached £37,000,000 sterling. This is a frightful diminution; but the money value of the exports is not a correct indication of the diminution in trade, because, as the price is somewhat increased, quantity and not value is the more accurate test. The fact is, that last year only half the usual quantity of cotton was manufactured. The textile exports of 1860 consisted of two-thirds of all the exports, of which cotton manufactures supplied much the largest portion. So that the importance of the trade in a national point of view is greater than those of iron, woollen, linen, and silk put together. It is true that the industry of the country was generally in a prosperous condition, and that the cotton trade is the only branch of industry under a cloud. The iron trade, the woollen trade, the linen trade, and the silk trade are all in a state of considerable activity; and if the cotton trade had remained in its ordinary state, there would have been almost too much prosperity for the kingdom to bear with temperance and moderation. In our distress, generous contributions have flowed in from all classes and from every part of the kingdom; but it is only justice to the manufacturing districts to state that up to the end of last year they had contributed very nearly one-half the total amount raised for the relief of the distress. The manufacturing districts have contributed £260,000 for this purpose, besides supporting a multitude of persons at a cost that had never been published. The other parts of the country have contributed £275,000; the colonies £53,000; and from foreign countries the sum of £5,000 had been received. It is with great pleasure that I state that the contributions of the North American States have been most liberal, that they have been received in the manufacturing districts with the greatest satisfaction, and that the utmost gratitude has been expressed for the supply of food which had so timely arrived. I congratulate Her Majesty's Government that they have at length achieved a commercial treaty with Belgium. I know how great are the difficulties that have to be overcome in concluding commercial treaties; but the example which was so beneficially set by the commercial treaty between England and France, having been now followed with respect to Belgium, I hope that the President of the Board of Trade, and the other members of the Government, will do everything in their power to extend these beneficial arrangements to the other countries of Europe. In respect of the French Treaty, I do not know how too much can be said in its praise. The advantages derived from the treaty of commerce with that country have nearly compensated for the loss of our American trade. In the year previous to the commercial treaty with France the value of the exports to that country amounted only to £4,754,854, but in the first year after the treaty it was no less than £9,901,179. And here I am glad to acknowledge the gratuitous services rendered by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden). No greater triumph has ever been achieved by any individual than has followed from my hon. Friend's efforts in bringing about this treaty. I hope the same enlightened policy will spread, and that the nations of the earth will derive the benefit. It will be a satisfaction to the country to see that the Estimates are to be framed on a principle of strict economy. A prospect of a reduction of expenditure at this particular juncture would be most welcome to the country. I trust that Her Majesty's Government will strain every nerve to reduce the public burdens and to make the taxes fewer and lighter to the people. At this particular time—and in the manufacturing districts in particular—the people could ill bear the burden they have to sustain, and I therefore trust that we may have fewer exactions made upon us. I cannot here avoid expressing my trust, that as the labouring classes have conducted themselves with such extreme propriety under extreme suffering, when the day comes for Parliamentary Reform their conduct will not be forgotten. I think it only an act of justice to state that that is my hope, and I believe it is the general wish of the country that the suffrage should be extended in some degree to the operatives in the manufacturing districts. The resources of the British Empire are vast—they are immense; in fact, they are wonderful; and I am sure I only express the wish of the House and of the country when I say that I sincerely hope that those resources may be developed to the honour of the Crown and to the great prosperity of the nation. The hon. Gentleman concluded by seconding the Address.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That," &c. [See page 73.]

Mr. Basley

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that there is no passage in the Speech of the Lords Commissioners which will be received with more complete and more cordial sympathy by this House than that in which the persuasion is expressed by the commands of Her Majesty that this House will sympathize with the sentiments which Her Majesty feels on so interesting an event as the marriage of the Heir Apparent of these realms. Sir, there was a time when Royal marriages were the perplexity of politicians, and it was supposed that by the adroit negotiation of such transactions we might often control and sometimes even change the balance of power. Those times, happily, are for ever passed. But, Sir, it would be, I am sure, a great error to believe that in a country like England, where happily the domestic affections are cherished and venerated, a Royal marriage might not conduce greatly to the power and influence of a Prince. We have seen in our time and in this country what may be the effect in that respect of a Royal alliance. Sir, his Sovereign parent offers to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales an example which, if followed, will, I am sure, endear him to the hearts of all Englishmen; and, Sir, I am equally confident that at this moment he will not forget that other parent whom a year ago in this House we met to mourn, who built up a Royal hearth on the principle of household love, and who yet, by his refined and profound intelligence, elevated it above the majesty of thrones. Sir, there is another matter in the Speech in which this House must deeply sympathize. I refer to the communication which has been made by command of Her Majesty as to that portion of our fellow-countrymen who have been subjected of late to so great a vicissitude in their fortunes. But, Sir, when we remember the fortitude with which they have endured that visitation, when we remember the spirit with which our suffering fellow-subjects have been sustained, I think there is, if I may so express it, some moral compensation for the material losses; and if it prove, as I hope and believe it may prove, that ultimately this trial may conduce to the sounder and more permanent prosperity of the community, I hope we may be justified in treating this great visitation rather as a misfortune than a calamity. Sir, I will not stop to panegyrize the conduct of any particular class. I will not offer now a needless, perhaps a fulsome tribute of admiration and approval to any particular body of Her Majesty's subjects. What in this terrible trial is of good cheer for England, is the proof it has furnished of the mutual trust and the entire affection that subsist among all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, and which indicate, whatever may be our form of Government, the existence of a real Commonwealth. If even, Sir, that question had not been touched upon in the Speech of the Royal Commissioners to-day, it would have been impossible, on the re-assembling of Parliament, to avoid inquiring what prospect there is of the cessation of this great misfortune. Her Majesty has not felt herself justified in offering to Parliament any prospect of an immediate termination of the causes of these difficulties. I know that there is nothing more difficult than to ascertain the precise character of contemporary events, though all will admit there is no knowledge more valuable to the statesman and the politician. For my own part, I am bound to say that from the first—and subsequent events have only confirmed my conviction—I have always looked upon the struggle which has occurred in America in the light of a revolution, and of a great revolution. Great revolutions, whatever may be their causes, are not lightly commenced, and are not concluded with precipitation. Before the civil war commenced, the United States of America were colonies, and we should not forget that such communities do not cease to be colonies because they are independent. They were not only colonies, but they were colonising, and they existed under all the conditions of colonial life except that of mere political dependence. But even before the civil war I think that all impartial observers must have been conscious that in that community there were smouldering elements which indicated the possibility of a change, and, perhaps, of a violent change. The immense increase of population; the still greater increase, perhaps, of wealth; the introduction of foreign races in large numbers as citizens, not brought up under the laws and customs which were adapted to a more limited and homogeneous race; the character of the political constitution, consequent perhaps on these circumstances, which became intolerable; the absence of any theatre for the educated and refined intellects of the country, which deteriorated public spirit and lowered public morality; but, above all, the increasing influence of the United States upon the political fortunes of Europe—these were all circumstances which indicated the more than possibility that the mere colonial character of these communities might suddenly and violently be subverted, and those imperial characteristics appear which seem to be the destiny of man. I cannot conceal from myself the conviction that whoever in this House may live to witness the ultimate conclusion of the consequences of this civil war will see, whenever the waters have subsided, a different America from that which was known to our fathers, and from that even of which this generation has had so much experience. It will, I believe, be an America of armies, it will be an America of diplomacy, it will be an America of rival States and manœuvring Cabinets, of frequent turbulence, and of frequent wars. With these views, I have myself, during the last Session, exerted whatever influence I might possess in endeavouring to dissuade my Friends from embarrassing Her Majesty's Government in that position of politic and dignified reserve which they appeared to me to have taken up on this question. It did appear to me—looking at these transactions across the Atlantic not as events of a mere casual character, but as being such as might probably influence America as the great French revolution influenced, and is still influencing, European affairs—that there was on our part due to the existing authorities in America a large measure of deference in the difficulties which they had to encounter. At the same time it was natural to feel, what I would not attempt to disguise, great respect for those Southern States who, representing a vast population of men, were struggling for some of the greatest objects of existence—independence and power. It appeared to me that the course which Her Majesty's Government had apparently resolved upon was one which, on the whole, was honourable to this country, and would prove beneficial to all classes of the community. I was therefore surprised and, individually speaking, somewhat mortified, when I found that in the course of the autumn Her Majesty's Government commissioned one of their Members to repair to the chief seats of industry in the country to announce, as I understood it, an entire change in the policy which they had throughout supported and sanctioned. It was not an accident; the declaration was made formally, and it was made avowedly with the consent and sanction of the Government. Now, Sir, what did that declaration mean? If it meant anything, it meant that the Southern States would be recognised; because, if it be true that they have created armies, navies, and a people, we are bound by every principle of policy and of public law to recognise their political existence. It appeared to me that upon the face of that declaration there was a great inconsistency. I thought that a course of conduct was then recommended by the Government which nothing had occurred in the interval to justify. It is most inconvenient that, upon a subject of such importance, and upon which the Government appeared from the first to have taken up a correct and dignified position, Her Majesty's Ministers should have exhibited such contradictory conduct and such conflicting opinions, and that during the autumn they should have felt it their duty to communicate this vacillation of purpose and this inconsistency of judgment to the whole nation. At the commencement almost of the struggle we were told by one Minister, who, above all, ought to be best informed on these topics—namely, the noble Earl the Minister of Foreign Affairs—what in the opinion of the Government, were the motives of this civil war. We were told that on the part of the North there was a desire to establish dominion, and on the part of the South to achieve independence. It may have been perhaps indiscreet on the part of the Government to make that public declaration of their opinion; but what are we to say of the subsequent definitions of this contest which have also been supplied by the Government? It is only a fortnight since one of the Cabinet Ministers told us that the whole cause of this war was the existence of slavery, and he vigorously denounced it as a pestilential institution. What agreement is there, then, between the President of the Board of Trade, who spoke but a fortnight ago, and the Foreign Minister, who ought to be the highest authority on matters of this character? What are we to say when one day we find an eminent member of the Cabinet recommending the recognition of Southern independence, and the next day another equally important colleague telling us that none of the conditions on which independence should be recognised exist in the Southern States. These varying opinions are so prevalent among the members of the Government that only a day or two ago one of them, not yet admitted to the Cabinet, but whose lips are steeped in the gravity of the Privy Council, told us that in the opinion of the Government the "Lord of Hosts was on the side of the Southern States." Sir, I think it is very much to be regretted that the Government did not adhere to that reserve which distinguished them last Session upon this subject, and that it is much to be regretted, that unless a change has taken place in their policy, there should not have been more silence during the recess as to their individual opinions.

But whatever may have been the disinclination of Her Majesty's Government to interfere in the conflict between the Northern and Southern States, there does not appear to have been any objection to interference in other States. So far as we can judge of the state of affairs, they have employed the autumn in interfering in almost every part of the world, except America. Their objection, therefore, to interfering is not an abstract one. We are promised in the Speech of the Royal Commissioners papers in reference to Greece, Italy, and Denmark. I should say that on all those subjects papers are very necessary; they may throw some light upon transactions and communications which certainly startled and perplexed us during the recess. But there is one country which is not mentioned in the Royal Speech, respecting which I should be glad to get some information and some particulars as affecting the popular question of the day—non-interference—and that is China. I wish we had a more accurate, or rather, I should say, a more precise idea of what our relations are with the Chinese, and what is going on with the Chinese, than seems to be in the possession of Parliament, and I wish we could command more knowledge on the subject than is to be obtained from the Royal Speech. So far as I can judge from the communications which arrive by every mail, there is constant fighting going on in China, and that fighting appears to be supported in a great degree by our fellow subjects. By one mail we learn that a British Admiral is severely wounded. Another mail informs us that an English Colonel has been killed. A great deal of slaughter is oc-caused by causes at present unknown to us. But in the recess there was a communication made to the public by a member of the Government on the subject of China, which was of a startling character. There was a meeting of a scientific society, the Geographical Society, and it was attended by some very distinguished officers in Her Majesty's service, and these officers informed the meeting that they were going to China, having been engaged by the Emperor of China, to enlist their fellow subjects to fight in his behalf—in fact, another Spanish Legion. That was a communication which created a considerable effect, and there seemed some doubt on the part of the eminent chairman whether it could be depended upon; so, seeing a member of the Government present, he ventured to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman whether there was any authority for the statement made to the meeting, and that right hon. Gentleman rose and said it was perfectly true; he entirely agreed in the operations and enterprise, and wished all success to the gallant Englishmen who were enlisting their countrymen to fight for the Tartar dynasty of China, and he trusted that they would completely accomplish their object. There is, then, war in China. Officers in Her Majesty's service are enlisting British subjects, in order to interfere between the Emperor of China and his rebellious subjects; and I want to know whether that is a policy which the House approves, and whether they do not think it requires some explanation? Let me remind the House that about twenty-five years since our Chinese policy commenced. The noble Lord, the present First Minister, may be said to be its author. It began by attempting to put down the Tartar dynasty, and the noble Lord when informed by the late much respected Sir James Graham, then a Member of this House, that the population of China was very considerable, nearly half the population of the globe, and that it was not so very easy to put down a Government commanding resources of such magnitude, said it was very true the population consisted of about 300,000,000, but half the population consisted of secret societies; that the great body of the subjects of the Emperor of China were discontented with his Government, and he was confident they would have support of which the House had no knowledge; the Government was well informed, and the House might depend upon it the war would be successful. The war was successful. It was successful in developing ever since these secret societies, which have taken other names familiar to the House. Twenty-five years have elapsed, and the noble Lord who made war against the Tartar dynasty is now supporting the Tartar dynasty and making war against these rebellious subjects of the Emperor of China. We have completely changed our position. We are making war against the Taeping insurrection. There has been a great controversy in this House as to the origin of the insurrection. Who are the Taipings? What are the Taipings? Sir, I maintain that we have nothing to do with the Taipings. Whether they are patriots, or whether they are brigands, is nothing to the people of England. The status of the Taipings is a question for China, not for England; and if we attempt now in this illegitimate and roundabout manner to support the Tartar dynasty, we shall ultimately be involved in another Chinese war for a different object and on a different side from that which we have hitherto taken. I say it is a matter of great importance, at a moment when we hear for the first time of a reduction of public expenditure, that we should not get involved again in a China war. Chinese wars have been one of the most considerable causes of financial embarrassment in this country, and have led very much to that increase of taxation against which we have heard so many murmurs lately. We are promised in the Speech a reduction of the public expenditure, and no doubt it will not be inconsiderable, or it would not be announced in a Speech from the Throne. I am extremely glad to hear it. I ventured last year, knowing what must inevitably occur, to call the attention of the House to our expenditure. We were then told retrenchment was impossible, because if we retrenched, we should be subservient to France. I am happy to hear now that retrenchment does not involve subserviency to a foreign Power. But if we want any real retrenchment, it is not by a careless and hasty cutting down expenditure, which possibly may be necessary; it is by taking care that our policy is a policy which does not lead to expenditure. Chinese policy and some other policies lead to expenditure, and we must take care to check such a policy if we want any reduction which is not mere moonshine. We hear a great deal of the frugal Government of the Duke of Wellington. The Duke of Wellington was not a Prime Minister who would have starved the army. The Duke of Wellington, it is well known, had an equal admiration and feeling for the other branch of Her Majesty's service. It is quite clear the army and navy under the Duke of Wellington would be in an efficient and complete state. We are told that in those days we had not the Empire which we now possess. We have some colonies which we did not possess in the days of the Duke of Wellington, but I believe that the colonial expenditure then was greater than it is now, because those considerable changes in the government of colonies, which have led to a reduction of expenditure, had not then been carried into effect. Therefore the Duke of Wellington had a great army and navy to maintain, and our establishments abroad and our colonies, and yet was a frugal Minister. Why was he a frugal Minister? Because he did not follow a diplomacy of intrigue—because his policy was a truly Conservative policy. It was not a policy of sensation. It was not a policy of surprise. Such a policy may suit Continental nations, where public opinion only takes in the consideration of external affairs. Such a policy may suit new dynasties; but a diplomacy of intrigue and a policy of sensation and surprise are not necessary for a country like England, where liberty and industry occupy sufficiently the energies and minds of the people, and where we are blessed with a Constitution deeply rooted in the convictions of the country and supported by the traditions of centuries. It is necessary clearly to understand this. Let it not be supposed that because we advocate a frugal and economical administration of the public funds, we are opposed to an efficient state of the public service or the maintenance of those establishments abroad which are necessary to maintain our position; and let it be remembered that the inevitable result of a restless policy must be an expenditure very incompatible with the permanency of the reductions which are now promised us.

Well, we are to receive these papers on Denmark, Italy, and other places. I will wait until they are before us before I touch on those subjects, certainly before I touch on the subject of Denmark. I may say I think with due humility that Denmark is a subject of which I am not entirely ignorant. I remember in the year 1848 taking the liberty of bringing the subject of Schleswig-Holstein before this House, and I was supported at least with the sympathy of the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and I think by a speech from the noble Lord the First Minister. I will not venture to introduce that subject on this occasion. Not being entirely ignorant of it, I will venture to say of the Schleswig-Holstein question that it is one which few understand and none can explain. Who, then, could have supposed that the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would, during the recent autumn, when we supposed him to be in the enjoyment of that relaxation which I am sure nobody could have grudged him, have thought it discreet and necessary to revive this interminable question—that he should, at a moment when there were so many other points of importance to engage his attention, have deemed it his duty to write a despatch into the merits of which I will not now enter, but of which I must be permitted to say this, that it laid down doctrines apparently contrary to the policy which the noble Lord advocated when he was the most responsible Minister of the Crown? Now, I will hardly make a remark upon what occurred at Rome, because I imagine we must have some information on the subject. I deem it but right, however, to remind the House that two years ago, on an occasion when I thought it my duty to speak in reference to some of our relations with Italy, suggesting that the settlement of the Roman question might not be found to be so easy as some hon. Gentlemen seemed to suppose, I added, that the question of the residence of the Pope was not one to be disposed of offhand; that it was one which involved his independence, one which was equally interesting to Protestant as to Roman Catholic States, and peculiarly interesting, as had always been held by our greatest statesmen, among Protestant States, to the Sovereign of the United Kingdom. I also ventured to say that the selection of the country in which the Pope should take up his permanent residence would, before it could be arrived at, result in considerable and distressing misunderstanding.

What did the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, who was then a Member of this House, say on that occasion? He said that the fears to which I gave expression were merely imaginary, and that I contemplated the occurrence of contingencies which would probably never come to pass. Now, however, although twenty-four months have not since elapsed, we find Roman Catholic and Protestant Powers in active competition on the very question where the Pope is to take up his residence and under whose influence he is to remain. I shall postpone adverting to the more important considerations connected with this theme until another occasion, but I thought it my duty to remind the House to-night of the remarks which I once made on the subject, and which have been completely justified by the event. Something will, I take it for granted, appear in the papers to be laid on the table which will explain, or at least mitigate, the alarming and intolerable absurdity of the position as it now presents itself to impartial observers. Well, the noble Lord, in this mellow harvest of autumnal indiscretion to which I have been alluding, was not content with disturbing the waters of the Baltic, but appears to have been very active in the Mediterranean; and here, I think, we arrive at a point in reference to which much information ought to be expected from Her Majesty's Ministers. Controversies have often taken place with respect to the foreign policy of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. Very different opinions prevail on the subject, and very different descriptions are given of it. Sometimes the foreign policy of the noble Lord is called spirited, sometimes it is pronounced turbulent. Sometimes the noble Lord is described as the incarnation of Liberalism; at other times he is denounced as the ready tool of any despot, provided only the despot be powerful. We shall, I suppose, have some information in a few days respecting the incredible intelligence which has within the last few hours reached us relative to the conduct of the Government in the case of Brazil. But, be that as it may, there is one point on which the noble Lord has been fortunate enough not to have been misconceived in the course of his life—a destiny which awaits few eminent men. The noble Lord, at all times and on whichever side of the House he happened to sit, has had the credit of being a consistent and determined and most able supporter of the independence of the Turkish Empire. The noble Lord maintained not only that this independence was of the utmost importance to this country, but went much further, and contended that the resources of Turkey, if they had but fair play, were amply sufficient to uphold her integrity and independence, without the ultimate assistance and contrivance of Foreign nations. The noble Lord was, in short, supposed by some to have taken even an exaggerated view of her case. He opposed, for example, with great warmth and ardour, the undertaking of a French gentleman to effect the penetration of the Isthmus of Suez. That the noble Lord deemed to be an enterprise dangerous to the Turkish empire. It would, he contended—to use his own expression—cut the territory of the Sultan in two; and he offered, therefore, to the project his strongest opposition. When he took that course, the present Secretary for Foreign Affairs dissented from his view of the question. He was in favour of penetrating the Isthmus, and he gave expression to many opinions which were considered quite heretical by those who took up the same view of the matter as the noble Lord opposite. When, therefore, the present Government was formed, and the noble Lord made choice of the present Secretary for Foreign Affairs to fill the important office which he holds—the very statesman who seemed so widely to differ from him as to the expediency of maintaining the existence of the Turkish empire—great anxiety was felt among some of those by whom the opinions of the First Minister on the subject were shared. But in the course of this extraordinary autumn an opportunity presented itself to the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary to relieve the public mind of Europe and Asia from all anxiety with respect to it—an opportunity, which perhaps no Minister has had for a considerable time, of in the most formal manner expressing the policy of the Government on this vital question of the maintenance of the Turkish empire and the general disposition of political influence in the Levant. It so happened that shortly after the House rose there took place in Turkey a series of what I should term artificial insurrections—I mean insurrections got up by foreign agents and patronized and paid by foreign Governments. One of considerable importance took place in Montenegro. That insurrection was put down promptly and effectively by the Porte, and the Minister for Foreign Affairs at St. Petersburg, who was supposed—perhaps unjustly—to be a very enthusiastic patron of the Prince of Montenegro, generously wishing to cover his discomfiture and retreat, wrote a despatch to our Government in which he complained of the hard terms which the Sultan exacted from the conquered rebels. Now, I do not think there was any necessity to answer that despatch. That, however, is of course a matter of taste, and the Secretary for Foreign Affairs is not a Minister who passes over an opportunity of writing a letter, as we all know. He did, at all events, answer the despatch in question, and very conclusively as to the immediate point of complaint, because he said he did not think the terms were more severe than any conquering Power would, under the circumstances of the case, have exacted. He, however, went further, and said he would take the opportunity of entering into the whole question of our policy with regard to the Turkish empire. Now, all temperate men are, I suppose, anxious for tranquillity in the Levant, as of importance, not only to English but to European interests. That desire is at the same time consistent with the belief that in the case of the subject races of the Porte there should be at least progress, and, for all we know, ultimate independence. The Secretary for Foreign Affairs was, however, not at all satisfied with this moderate opinion. He accordingly laid down in his despatch, as an absolute alternative, that the Turkish empire must be maintained, or that the subject races—Slavonian and Greek—would be involved in internecine struggles; and that finally, after cutting each other's throats, the country would be partitioned, and that the partition would probably lead to a general war. Not satisfied with this—the despatch is dated the 27th of September, 1862, only four months ago—the noble Lord warns these poor Slavonians and Greeks, representing many millions of an industrious population, that they are not to indulge in what they call great ideas. He says to them, "You aim at terminating your allegiance to the Porte and ultimately reviving the Greek empire, but these are views which we shall never tolerate. They must end in general disaster. They are views which will lead not only to the destruction of the Porte, but which will subvert every other throne in Europe." Well now, Sir, a few weeks after this a revolution occurred in Greece, and one of their first steps was to elect an English Prince for their Sovereign. What encouragement the Greeks had to elect an English Prince of course it would not now be convenient to inquire. From what reaches me, I apprehend, however, that that subject will sooner or later occupy the attention of the House of Commons. We were told to-day by Her Majesty's Speech that the diplomatic engagements of Her Majesty's Crown prevented the acceptance of the throne of Greece by Prince Alfred; but if that was the case, why were the Greeks kept in suspense?—a suspense most injurious and most trying under the circumstances in which they found themselves. Diplomatic engagements are precise and positive; they are not engagements more now than they were four months ago. Therefore, this is a passage in the conduct of Her Majesty's Government which requires some elucidation. But that to which I now wish to call the attention of the House is the extraordinary circumstance that about the same time the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—who is opposed to creating any ideas amongst the Greeks of extension of their borders and increase of their territory, to the destruction of the Turkish Government, and ultimately, perhaps, to the convulsion of Europe—should have taken that opportunity to announce the intention of Her Majesty's Government greatly to increase the territory of the Greeks, and that in a very peculiar manner, by reducing the territories of Her Majesty. Upon this subject I hope that we may receive some information to-night. I know that we are told that public opinion has decided in favour of the cession of the Ionian Isles to Greece. I think that the gradual and mature opinion of an enlightened and inquiring people ought to receive the vigilant attention of an English Minister, and should greatly influence his conduct, but I deny that the gabble of clubs is public opinion, or that public opinion is the irresponsible chatter of a desultory multitude. Public opinion upon such a question as the cession of provinces cannot be formed except after mature inquiry, with ample knowledge and the grave deliberation which becomes Cabinets and Parliaments. We are told that this is no cession of territory whatever—merely a resignation of a Protectorate intrusted to us under the treaties of 1815. This is very dangerous ground to take; and I most earnestly recommend the House to pause before they accept representations of this kind. The treaties of 1815 intrusted the Ionian Isles to England about in the same manner that they intrusted Paris to the French people. Both parties previously possessed what was intrusted to them. We possessed the Ionian Isles before the treaties of 1815, and it becomes us to consider how we possessed them. We possessed them by right of conquest, and the question immediately arises why were they conquered? You do not conquer places out of mere wantonness or for amusement. The Ionian Isles were conquered because the great men to whom was intrusted the duty of guarding British interests and maintaining British power in those waters represented most earnestly to the English Government that they could not accomplish their behests so long as these insular harbours were in possession of our powerful rival and enemy. It is, or it should be well known, that the occupation of the Ionian Isles by the French was part of the secret negotiations of Tilsit, and it was only in consequence of an arrangement with Russia, before war was declared between that Power and England, that French troops were landed from Russian ships on these Islands, where the injurious influence exercised by them during the war upon British shipping and British interests was so great that no less a man than Lord Collingwood impressed upon the British Government that it was absolutely necessary that these harbours should be in our possession. And they were in our possession. Corfu was not seized in a military sense, but six of these islands, including Cephalonia, which was described by Sir Charles Napier—no mean authority on this or any subject—as possessing the most considerable harbour in the Mediterranean, had been conquered, and had been even years in the possession of England at the time of the peace. And why was not Corfu in our possession? Why, Corfu was a thorn in our side. We had not succeeded in taking Corfu, but we had strictly blockaded it; and when Napoleon suddenly fell, the French surrendered it to England by a military convention. It was in every sense a military surrender, and therefore, when the Congress of Vienna had to deliberate upon the settlement of Europe, we were in military possession of these islands, which we had in fact conquered and occupied, because in the possession of our enemy we had found them most injurious to our power and our interests. The noble Lord proposes that these islands shall now be given to Greece. See what is the effect of that! You are favouring that very policy which, on the 27th of September of last year, the noble Lord denounced with, I think, such unnecessary warmth in his despatch to Prince Gortschakoff. You are increasing the resources, the population, and the wealth of Greece. What interpretation the Greeks put upon this cession you may learn from the meeting which immediately took place in Corfu, and in which they, to use a phrase well understood in this House, intimated to you that they accept the Ionian Isles as an instalment. You are encouraging them to aspire to the possession of Albania, Thessaly, and other provinces, and to develop that great idea which the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary says is full of such fatal consequences, commencing with an attack upon the integrity and independence of the Turkish empire, and bringing about possible partition and certain war. It may be right to do all this, and this is not the occasion on which to enter into a discussion as to what our policy ought to be; but let us clearly understand that Her Majesty's Government are now following a policy different from that which they have hitherto pursued upon the Eastern question. They have changed their course. It is not the policy which the noble Lord has always upheld in this House with regard to Greece; it is not the policy which the Foreign Secretary only in September last advocated in such burning terms in his despatch to Prince Gortschakoff. You are entirely changing your course, and you are encouraging the Greeks to occupy that position and to pursue that career which you have denounced as most injurious to the interests of England, and perhaps hostile to the tranquillity of the world. It is said that the Government will not give up these islands without conditions, but the very fact that you are going to exact conditions proves that you ought not to give up the islands; because if the surrender can only be made upon conditions, it proves that the surrender without conditions would be injurious. And then what security have you that your conditions will be fulfilled? What are your conditions? To my mind no Minister ever plunged into a deeper abyss of absurdity. Your conditions are that Greece shall have a constitutional monarchy, and at the same time shall not disturb her neighbours. But what is the immediate result of a constitutional monarchy? A constitutional Government immediately produces parties, and is it not quite obvious that the principle upon which the Opposition, or as it will then be called "the Liberal" party, will be formed in Greece, will be the extension of the territories and carrying out the great idea? And therefore when the noble Lord talks of conditions, his conditions will perpetuate the very conclusions which he opposes. If this be true, then, so far as regards Greece, you have changed your policy; so far as regards Greece, you are pursuing a policy which will produce results which you yourselves have deprecated and denounced. So much as to your policy upon Greece. Now, what is its influence upon England? I have shown the House that these islands were taken by us because their possession by an enemy was injurious to our interests, and therefore it is quite absurd to maintain that their possession by England is not conducive to our interests. It is idle to meet us by arguing the case on a technical term and to tell us that we are not the possessors of the islands, but only the protectors. You might as well say that the treaties of 1815 made Prussia the protector of the Rhine, and not the possessor, because the Rhine was given to Prussia for the specific purpose of making a barrier against France; you might as well say that the Italian provinces were only intrusted to Austria for the common good of Europe, as was alleged at the Congress; but Prussia and Austria believed, and believe, that the possession of the Rhine and of the Italian provinces contributed to their power, or do you think they would have retained them? We are told that we are only protectors. Are difficult questions like the cession of a province to be settled by technical special pleading such as this? I am sure the House of Commons will never sanction such a spirit of dealing with public interests. Within the last twenty-five years the route to our Indian possessions has been changed; and, whatever the intention of the treaties of 1815, the country has been constantly congratulated on having a chain of Mediterranean garrisons, which secured our Indian empire. I am perfectly aware that there is a school of politicians—I do not believe they are rising politicians—who are hostile to the very principle of a British empire. But I have yet to learn that Her Majesty's Ministers have adopted the wild opinions which have been prevalent of late. Professors and rhetoricians find a system for every contingency and a principle for every chance; but you are not going, I hope, to leave the destinies of the British empire to prigs and pedants. The statesmen who construct, and the warriors who achieve, are only influenced by the instinct of power, and animated by the love of country. Those are the feelings and those the methods which form empires. There may be grave questions as to the best modes of obtaining wealth—some may be in favour of protection of domestic and colonial interests, some of unrestricted competition, or some, of what I am quite surprised has now become so modish—commercial treaties and reciprocal arrangements for the advantage of commercial exchange—propositions which used to be scouted in this House; but there can be no question either in or out of this House that the best mode of preserving wealth is power. A country, and especially a maritime country, must get possession of the strong places of the world. I have heard no argument to justify the course Her Majesty's Government has hitherto pursued, or the expectations they have held out relative to the Ionian Islands. The language of the Speech leads me to hope that the arrangement alluded to is by no means matured. As far as I can understand, from what I have read in other places, a considerable period must elapse, under any circumstances, before that arrangement is effected; and in that time much may happen. You propose to give these settlements, which have been fostered by the power of England, and which abound in wealth and public spirit, to the Provisional Government of what at present certainly is a distracted country. Whatever the present posture of affairs, I trust we shall not precipitately adopt a policy which appears to me to have been taken up with some caprice, and may lead to serious consequences. The noble Lord will have an opportunity of informing us as to the intentions of the Government. I understand that we are not at all pledged by the mode in which the Address is framed to give any approbation to the policy indicated in the Speech. With that feeling, I shall, of course, offer no objection to the passing of the Address. But after the formal announcement which has been made I felt it my duty to throw out these suggestions to the House, to show that the question is not one of that simple character which some are apt to suppose—that it may lead to very dangerous consequences, and involve some of the gravest considerations that can possibly be brought before public men.

COLONEL SYKES said, he was sorry to say his Indian experience inclined him to strengthen the doubts which he had formerly expressed regarding the likelihood of a perennial adequate supply of cotton from that quarter, and he expressed these doubts in the interests of the helpless operatives in Lancashire, lest the generous public might relax in its efforts to mitigate human sufferings, which, if left to themselves, might give rise to dangerous results. He must warn the House that the present supply, he feared, was only spasmodic, as, owing to the high prices attained in the Liverpool and Manchester markets, the whole of the cotton ordinarily used in India for domestic purposes was finding its way to this country. But was there any reason for believing that the field of culture had been in any great degree enlarged? For the most part in India the cultivators were also the proprietors of the soil, whereas in this country tenants were bound usually by their landlords to a rotation of crops; the Indian farmers were absolutely unfettered by any analogous regulations, and the Government had no power of interference. In case the cultivator thought he could profit more by raising cotton than sugar, indigo, oil-seeds, or the cercalæa, he might be induced to do so; but otherwise the ordinary instincts of man told us that he would not sacrifice his own interests to the wishes of others. There was no doubt but that India, with its area of 1,488,070 square miles, possessed diversities of soil and climate adapted to the production of all the ten known species of the cotton plant, but whether the farmer would engage in their cultivation depended upon remunerative prices in Europe; and as long as the present prices lasted in Europe, a good deal of cotton would come from India, but he feared they could not flatter themselves that the turning point in Lancashire distress had yet been reached. His hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Bazley) had said that we were at peace with all the world. But what was the fact? We were actually at war, contrary to our professed neutrality, with nearly one-third of the Chinese empire, at least a hundred millions of people. The cost of the position which the English Government had taken up in China was not less than £1,000,000 per annum, and the cost of our past Chinese wars, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was seven million five hundred and fifty-four thousand pounds, which enormous sum had been spent to compel the Chinese to legalize the traffic in opium for the benefit of the East Indian revenue and the amassing of millionaire fortunes for individuals. The Tartars and the Chinese had been in hostility for the last two centuries, and secret societies had been in constant action in China against the Tartar or Foreign Government. The indigenous Chinese or Taepings, who are now at war with the Tartar Government, were men who professed Christianity, who asked the British nation to accept their friendship, and who had shown that they knew how to conduct trade, notwithstanding the statements of his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. The truth was, there had been a systematic suppression of all that was favourable to the Taepings and an exaggeration of all that was damaging. It was a fact that since these insurgents had been in possession of the districts from which green tea and silk were obtained, 20,040 bales of silk for the year ending October 31, 1862, had been exported from Shanghai in excess of the usual quantity. That was effected by European agents traversing these so-called desolated districts with money in their hands wherewith to make their purchases, and they were protected and encouraged by the Taepings. This fact alone illustrates the animus that prompts the statement that they are universal desolators. We were now drilling the Tartars—putting arms into their hands, and supplying them with shot and shell, allowing foreigners to command them, and the chances were, from their past perfidy, that they would take an early occasion to turn these arms against ourselves. It was alleged that it was a mockery to call by the name of Christianity the religion which the insurgents professed, and it was said that they ought to be exterminated as blasphemers and desolators. Much blood had been shed, and the Taepings had been overwhelmed by our shot and shell, yet they had never retaliated, though provoked by acts at which humanity shudders. He would read an extract from a letter from Shanghai, which he had received by the last China mail—

"S— told me that he was at Tsingpoo at the capture, and had to hold the heads of fourteen women whose throats were being sewn up. There were many more, but he held the heads of fourteen with his own hands."

Sir, said the hon. Member, this is but a microscopic illustration, so to say, of the gigantic horrors that have occurred in our Chinese wars; and the blood both of Tartars and Taepings is reeking up to Heaven in judgment against us. The House was told that the Taepings were blasphemous, and that their Emperor was especially blasphemous. But he (Colonel Sykes) held in his hand the first copy which had reached England of a Taeping Bible and Testament. It had been printed at Nanking, by order of this so-called "blasphemous Emperor," and had his Imperial seal upon it, who thus at all events gave his followers an opportunity of judging of his pretensions. All the books of the New Testament were complete, and of the Old Testament the Pentateuch was also complete. The translation was the work of one of the ablest of our Chinese scholars, Gutzlaff. So much then for the blasphemous character of the Taepings. With regard to the Tartar boy Emperor, his authority, or rather that of Prince Kung, did not extend far beyond the walls of Peking; and of this we had a patent illustration by tea boats being stopped above Hankow, and double duties levied, contrary to treaty; which provoked the exploit of Lieutenant Poole, in the gunboat Havoc (appositely named), who not only released the tea boats without paying any duty at all, but brought away as prisoner the custom-house officer of Tan-kau, and seized the Mandarin and Imperial war junks! Yet we were engaged in supporting Prince Kung. At Shanghai we collect the customs duties, and they ought to be sent either to the Emperor at Peking, or to the local viceroy. But they were instead used in paying Mr. Lay his £4,000 or £5,000 a year, and his forty-one European custom-house assistants; in purchasing gunboats and munitions of war in England, and in paying Captain Osborne and British officers to go out as mercenaries. If we went on as we had been doing, we should become the rulers of China, as we had become the rulers of India; and how would that be regarded by France and Russia? We should inevitably get into disputes, if not into hostilities, with those countries. He was very glad the question had been raised by the hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, and he hoped that during the Session a definite vote of the House would be taken on the subject.

Lord ROBERT MONTAGU said, that the hon. Gentleman the Mover of the Address had in his speech shown a strong sympathy with the Southern States of America, defended the institution of slavery, and manifested his dislike to the Northern States, his hatred of popular institutions, and his aversion to liberty. The speech of the Mover of the Address was, it was well known, always inspired by the Government; in this case it was of course suggested by the Tory Leader of the Radical party. There was one thing that surprised him in the Royal Speech, and that was the announcement of a reduction of expenditure. He was surprised, because, remembering the antecedents of the Government, he had never expected any reduction in the Estimates. He must confess that he was offended at the tardiness of this act of justice; for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had shown last year that the expenditure might have been reduced by £5,000,000; many other hon. Members had added their entreaties to the denunciations of the right hon. Gentleman; but Her Majesty's Government turned from them with scorn, and despised both proofs and denunciations. Her Majesty's Government were strong then; but what had happened since? The Home Secretary had nursed and bred up a gang of Thugs, so that it was unsafe to go abroad at night in the metropolis of civilization. The Secretary for India had been threatened with impeachment, and was, it was reported, about to be put in a place of safety, by being stowed away in the pleasant refuge across the lobby. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland was unpopular in that country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had been disappointed in his revenue. The Secretary for Foreign Affairs had hedged his real opinions with regard to Denmark, he had meddled with Greece, and got into difficulties in America. The noble Viscount still held the undulating reins of power, but it was with the feeble and senile grasp of a palsied hand. The hon. Mover of the Address had stated that a surplus was anticipated. If there was a surplus, it would be the first that Her Majesty's Government had had to boast of. He (Lord Robert Montagu) however anticipated not a surplus but a great deficiency. It must be remembered, in the first place, that last year had been a very bad year; this was then taken for an excuse; it may not be used as a foil to this year. The Revenue must always be compared with the Estimated Revenue. The total Estimated Revenue was £70,190,000. Three quarters of this was £52,642,000, while the actual receipts in three quarters of a year had amounted to only £51,889,000, thus showing a deficiency of a million and a quarter in three quarters of a year. In 1858-9 there was an expenditure of £60,961,315, and a surplus of £813,401. In 1859-60, when the Estimates were also prepared by Lord Derby's Government, there was a surplus of £1,587,379. But in 1860-1, under the Government of that financial reformer the noble Viscount, the expenditure was £68,354,611, and there was a deficit of £2,558,384. In 1861-2 there was another deficit, to the amount of £2,412,006. What was taken out of the pockets of the people in 1858-9 was less by £4,000,000 than in 1861-2—a year in which there was misery in Lancashire, want in Warwickshire, and starvation, he believed, in Ireland. The expenditure in 1860-1 was eight millions greater than in 1858-9, which increase was owing chiefly to naval and military expenditure. In the years 1858-9 the surpluses amounted to two millions and a half. In the two succeeding years, under the noble Viscount's Government, there were deficits to the amount of five millions, besides which the Exchequer balances were reduced; while we had anticipated all our extraordinary resources—war taxes on tea and sugar, war income tax, and war duties on spirits. This he would prove to have arisen from the meddling foreign policy of the noble Viscount. Sir Richard M. Bromley said, in his evidence before the Committee on Public Accounts (149)—

"The last ten years have been an exceptional period; it has been a race for building, a race for getting in stores, a race for getting men into the service," hence "Parliament has lost the control which it had," when the "Votes were of the usual amount."

The hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto), said, in his book on Taxation, that we had spent £150,000,000 more than we should if expenditure had remained as in 1853. The Duke of Somerset (1408) said—

"The excesses are almost always owing to unforeseen circumstances of an uncertain character—demands made upon the Admiralty for naval force by the Foreign Office, and by the Colonial Office, in different parts of the world."

Afterwards (1522-7) he showed that secret and illegal meddling with other countries was the cause of all this extra expenditure. Mr. Gladstone (1543) said—

"That in 1853-4 the expenditure of the army and navy ran within certain accustomed channels," while "for the last three years either military operations, or political operations approximating to a military character, have been in progress," so that "the Estimates have ceased to be mere financial questions, and have become political questions of the first order."

He afterwards explained this (1554) by saying that it was difficult to estimate when, the country not being in a "recognised state of war," we "had important military operations in hand;" but that before 1853 "questions ran in an easy and established course." This meddling foreign policy might be traced to another cause, also fostered by the present Government. He alluded to the question of foreign loans, which he had brought before the House last Session. It was reported that we were going to guarantee a debt of five millions for the construction of a railway in Nova Scotia. As the Grand Trunk Railway did not pay, he did not see what benefit the country would receive for raising this money by imperial debentures. Last year this country had lent half a million to Morocco and eight millions to the Porte, and the success of both of these loans was secured by the direct interposition of the Government. There was a loan to Venezuela, the interest of which the consul was to gather; besides upwards of eighteen million in loans to other countries. These loans bring us into unpleasant contact with other nations, and cause this constant meddling and expense; besides which, this money, which goes in unproductive works, is withdrawn from the capital which employs labour. If this money did not go abroad in loans, it could not lie idle, but must be invested in industrial works at home. It might be urged that these loans are private matters; yet the Government encouraged the system, when a Commission was sent to one country; treaties were made with others, mortgaging the customs to the bondholders, and when an ambassador received the interest in one place, and a consul in another. He was sure he would be answered, as he was last year, by hearing quoted Lord Palmerston's Circular to the Representatives at Foreign States—

"It has hitherto been thought by the successive Governments of Great Britain undesirable that British subjects should invest their capital in loans to foreign Governments, instead of employing it in profitable undertakings at home."

He was glad to be supported in his opinion by the noble Viscount's words; all he complained of was that the noble Viscount did not act up to his words. If he had, we should not have gone to war with Mexico last year for the sake of the bondholders. These guarantees and securities caused meddling; for a security was given only where a debtor had no credit. Now, in the case of a State, how was a security to be realized? By sending ships and armies, and fitting out expeditions. Thus it was that loans caused meddling, while a meddling foreign policy caused expense. Hence came to the gravamen against the Government—namely, the proposed dismemberment of the empire. His principal objection to the cession of the Ionian Islands was the suddenness and secrecy with which it had been resolved upon. It was said in excuse that the cause of it was sudden and unexpected—namely, the revolution in Greece; but he contended that Her Majesty's Government must have foreseen that event. No papers had been laid before Parliament to explain it; but the able correspondent of The Times—General Eber—who was now in Greece, had pointed out that one of the main causes of the revolution was the disposition of the Government to centralize the whole administration of the country. Centralization, by increasing the number of boards and of paid functionaries, of course augments the expense of the country; while it took from the people all participation in the management of affairs. If this, then, was the cause of the Revolution, it was not sudden. The cause had operated gradually until the crisis or culminating point was reached. Moreover, the Revolution had begun in Thiotis, where "ignorant peasants, and illiterate men, without one political idea," had all shouted for Prince Alfred. They could know nothing of his character; hence their choice was not made on personal grounds. They had not a political idea; and therefore it was not on political grounds. It must have been the result of some intrigue. For revolutionary agents were merely the tools of other Powers; and outbreaks were the anticipated results of intrigues; while the Power who was readiest could possess itself of the passions which were aroused, but which were blind. On this point he could not forbear quoting words used at Sunderland last October, by the Member of the Cabinet who, being the most eloquent, uttered most fully the thoughts of the Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said—

"And if under peculiar circumstances, in his humble sphere, he had been either a promoter or a favourer of revolution, he did not disclaim the responsibility."

He would, however, not press this point. All he contended was, that the pretended cause or simulated occasion of the cession was not sudden nor unexpected. In former days it used to be the practice to uphold the Constitution, to respect the rightful authority of the Sovereign; and non-interference used to be the Whig cry. The year before last, the astounding doctrine had been propounded by Lord Russell, that a people was at liberty to get rid of its rulers; that the sovereign's authority was not to be respected, nor the Constitution maintained. This was followed by ballot-box hoaxes, and annexation decrees. This year we had gone a step further: a people was not to choose its own rulers, nor settle its own affairs; and yet the Constitution was not to be maintained, nor its sovereign to be respected. But the Great Powers (if there were any such) were to impose a King and overturn a Constitution; while the ballot-box hoaxes were still to be practised. And this bitter dose was to be sugared down by the gift of the Ionian Islands. States before now had intrigued to acquire territory, without waging war, without incurring expense, and without running risks. But he had never heard of a Government intriguing to lose a territory which had been gained by the flow of British blood and by the creation of an enormous debt. What right had the Government to give away, without sanction, that which had cost so much money? The money had each year been spent for some object, which was now to be given away without the nation's consent. What right had the Government to contract the landmarks of the Empire? That which had been received in solemn trust should not be repudiated in secrecy and haste. The duties and liabilities of trustees were not pleasant; they were often costly. But when once a trust had been accepted, it was neither safe nor honourable to shirk it. What was founded on international compact remained binding until we had been absolved by the same authority which was a party to it. And if Parliament had voted supplies on the faith of those treaties (which it had done in 1817), then Parliament also should be consulted before the treaty is broken. However, what he especially objected to was the secrecy and haste which had been used, in order to evade the scrutinizing eye of the House. When the House had separated, no one dreamt that the Empire would have been dismembered, shorn, and clipped, before we had again assembled. If such a step were necessary, it could easily have been foreseen, and advice asked of Parliament. Or if Government had no forecast or prescience, then the House could have been assembled in December. He had always observed, however, that these great events were done in the recess, and were accomplished facts when the House met. With such contempt was the House usually treated; so despised on the part of the Government! He would now notice some arguments which had been used in favour of the cession. The Second of the Address had brought forward Lord Russell's despatch of August 1860; or rather that of October 1860, which had proclaimed a disregard of law and constitutional government and a scorn of treaties; that of August had proclaimed the sanctity of treaties, and the divine rights of Kings. Soon after the despatch of October had been published Signor Dandolo demanded that, in accordance with its doctrines, the Ionian islands should be ceded. Lord Russell answered by another despatch, in which he refused, on the ground that we had "paramount interests in the Adriatic." On this point he was questioned in the House just before he left it with a peerage, when he proved in reply that Corfu was "a very important position" to us, because of the danger of an insurrection in Greece, and of an attempt being made to extend the Greek Empire. However, that despatch of October, 1860, did not apply to this case; for the Ionians were not Greeks. Their language was Italian. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had addressed their assembly in Italian; and the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Layard), on May 7, 1861, had said—

"If they could assert nationality, might not Malta and Gibraltar do so too? or even some island with which it might be still more inconvenient for us to part? . . . We ought first to define in what nationality consists. Does it mean identity of race, of language, of religion, and of geographical limits? If identity on all these points were required, the Ionian islands had no right to claim nationality with Greece." [3 Hansard, clxii. 1699.]

We had therefore no opening to brag of our consistency, to brag of our generosity to Greek nationalities. Besides, to this desire to do something to brag of, he would apply the old proverb:—"Brag may be a very good puppy, but old Holdfast is a far better dog." We never could persuade other countries that we acted from motives of generosity. For no nation had ever surrendered territory, except on compulsion, or else in exchange for some material benefit. Besides, we piped, but Corfu would not dance. For Corfu resented the notion of being separated from this country. Why, then, should we ignominiously haul down our flag; and let our prestige suffer in the East; where this surrender would be regarded as a sign and symptom of weakness? It was said that the cession of the islands was a financial measure, in order to remedy our state of chronic deficit—to which he had alluded. If that were so, the House of Commons, whose privilege it was to decide on what objects public money should be expended, was, by this measure, being robbed of its control over the expenditure. Again, if the surrender took place merely to relieve our finances, then we certainly had nothing to brag of; we were selfishly consulting our own profit, and foisting off on the Greeks that which it was inconvenient for us to retain. Besides, what saving would be effected? We should not keep one soldier or one sailor the less, after the cession of Corfu. Again, it had been objected that the Ionians were turbulent and discontented, and ungovernable. Yet the Greeks, who could not govern themselves, were not likely to govern those restless islanders better than we could. Again, it was objected that an increase of territory was necessary to the improvement of Greek finances. They certainly were sorely in want of improvement; seeing that for thirty years they had paid no interest on their debt. Yet how an expenditure of £280,000 a year, in keeping up Corfu, would be of advantage to Greek finance was not very clear. If it were answered that the expenditure hitherto made on Corfu were not necessary, it would be an admission that the British taxpayer had been robbed for years to the extent of £280,000 a year. This argument proved too much: for it established this dilemma; either the Government had for years robbed the British taxpayer, or else they would ruin Greece with their baneful gifts. The Greeks had not paid the interest of the loan; yet their financial depravity was to be rewarded by an increase of territory. The Turks had always paid the interest of their debt; and if the boon were to be accorded to any one, it should be to the Turks. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Layard), on May 7, 1861, after saying that "in Albania there are very few Greek families," continued, "Corfu is not Greek, but Albanian; and if given up to any Power, it ought to be surrendered to Turkey." [3 Hansard, clxii. 1700.] Yet Lord Russell, on the contrary, had empowered Mr. Elliot to treat with Turkey for the cession of Albania and Thessaly. Whereupon The Times Correspondent (General Eber) said that this would be "fraught with immediate danger to Turkey," that it would "lead to a dismemberment of the Empire," for that the vassal states would throw off the suzerainty of the Porte. "Hence this negotiation indicates a complete change of our policy in the East." The strategic objection had now to be considered. The opinion of the Great Napoleon as to the importance of Corfu in a military point of view had been contested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his evidence before the Committee on Colonial Expenditure. The soundness of the opinion of the First Napoleon on that military matter had been disputed by the right hon. Gentleman; but he had never heard any independent military opinion in conformity with that of the right hon. Gentleman, and it would moreover be hard to invent an argument with regard to Corfu, which did not equally apply to Malta or Gibraltar. The strategic value of Corfu was, however, fully proved by the eagerness with which Corfu had been always seized and grasped by contending Powers in time of war. France had first held it, and it was confirmed to her by the Treaty of Campo Formio in 1797. It was then taken from France and erected into a Republic, by the Treaty of Amiens in 1802. Russia then seized it in 1804, and planted 7,000 troops there; France again seized it, and was confirmed in the possession by the Treaty of Tilsit in 1807; Lord Colclingwood took it in 1809, and it was finally put under our protectorate by the Treaty of Paris, of November 15, 1815. The objection might be quite true that distant positions weaken a state; because that the secret of war, as of a battle, was the power of rapid concentration at a single point. But a strong place, which could be held by a small body of men, acted as a diversion, and had the effect of keeping idle a large force of the enemy, which had to be employed in watching it. History showed that this was more especially the case with an island off an enemy's coast; for as the garrison may effect a landing at any point of the coast, an equal number of the enemy must be posted at various positions. This was clearly proved by the memorandum of the statesman Turgot, written for the use of the French King, during our war with our American Colonies. Thus Corfu might threaten the whole coast of the Adriatic; and, if surrendered, would be a menace to Trieste, to Italy, or to the Turkish coast of Albania. In this light the Chancellor of the Exchequer regarded the cession of Corfu in 1861. For after saying that—

"And I believe it would be nothing less than a crime against the safety of Europe—(I might even say against its immediate tranquillity—as connected with the state and course of the great Eastern question)—if England were at this moment to apply to the Powers of Europe to be allowed to surrender the protectorate of the Ionian Islands for the purpose of uniting them to free Greece. I must confess I think there would be great risk indeed—nay, that it would hardly be compatible with good faith to Turkey, if we were to allow Corfu to become under present circumstances, a portion of the Greek territory." [3 Hansard, clxii. 1688.]

The object of Greece in obtaining an extension of territory was merely to carry out the "Greek idea." This was fully proved by the Address of the Ionian Legislature to the Legislatures and Governments of Europe (of March 11, 1861). They used these words:—"The right is practically desired of placing the Cross over the Crescent." And "the first step" (in "the emancipation of the whole Greek race,"") is "the restoration of the Seven Islands to Greece." Again, the Deputation to the Lord High Commissioner on December 23, 1862, used these words in the Address which they presented—

"We add a hope of seeing magnanimous Albion, who now, by the annexation of the Ionian Islands, strengthens the central home of the liberty of the Hellenic race—a hope, we say, of seeing England also co-operate in the future contest which the Hellenes will have to sustain in the East in the interest of Christian civilization."

It was true that certain vague conditions were appended to the promise of cession. But these conditions had been invented a month after the promise had been made. They were as follows:—

"If the new Assembly of the representatives of the Greek nation should prove faithful to this declaration, should maintain constitutional monarchy, and should refrain from all aggression against neighbouring States."

Now, for how long were they to prove faithful before they were to obtain Corfu? for how long were they to maintain constitutional monarchy? for how long were they to refrain from their projected aggressions? And when Greece had already received the Ionian Isles—if she no longer remained within bounds but fought for her "idea," what would then be our course? How, then, should we coerce her? Should we occupy Greece, while the Russians went to Constantinople, and the French to Syria? Or should we jointly occupy Greece, and quarrel among ourselves in that little corner of the Earth? If we were once to endorse this principle, there would be no end to the claimants and their demands; Jersey would seek a union with France, Gibraltar must be annexed to Spain, and Malta to Italy—unless Malta, indeed, were reserved as a refuge for the Pope when driven out of Rome. The press had been already preparing the way for the cession of Gibraltar. It had been spoken of by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), whispered in the lobbies of the Cortes, and discussed in the Spanish Chambers. The English are said to be so fond of grasping and having that they swallow down unjust annexations in India. Should we, then, now submit to a cession of territory? Should we lose our hold on a strong place like Corfu, Gibraltar, or Malta, on which we had, year by year, spent so much money? Nay, should we allow it to be handed over slyly behind our backs, and ourselves treated with contempt, as if we were not worth consulting; as if our efforts to assert our rights were puny, weak, miserable, and to be despised? And should we be further insulted by being assembled to see the ink dry on the deed of British dishonour, and the sign of British weakness? On the other hand, what words could be more appropriate than these?—

"To abandon possessions gained at the cost of so much blood and treasure—many of them important outposts for the protection of our commerce and the security of our dominion—would be a violation of public faith and a forfeiture of national honour."

These were the words of the noble Viscount.

MR. MAGUIRE differed from the noble Lord on the question of Ionian cession, which he thought was a wise and prudent act, and it was one which Sir John Young, the British Governor, had long since recommended. With respect to Lancashire distress, he was glad to learn that it had abated. He, as chief magistrate of one of the principal cities in Ireland, had done everything in his power to evoke sympathy for the operatives; he had, however, now to state that Lancashire distress was very far exceeded by the misery that prevailed in Ireland. The statements which he made last year were evaded or denied, but he had since had the honour of laying upon the table papers proving the truth of all that he stated. But however bad the state of things might last year have been, it was now infinitely worse. There was not, he believed, a single man in Ireland, whatever his rank might be, who was not filled with alarm at the prospect which was before his countrymen for the next twelve months. The last harvest was a melancholy failure. Ireland was an agricultural country, not possessing the resources that this country enjoyed, and she had suffered from a long succession of failures in the crops, of which the last dealt the crushing blow. Some few estates, no doubt, continued prosperous, but generally speaking rents could not be paid with anything like punctuality or to any large amount this year. The small farmers throughout the country were almost annihilated because they were crushed under the weight of an accumulated load of debt, and they had no prospect before them but that Providence might give them an abundant harvest this year, which would to some extent compensate them for the successive failures of the previous years. The labouring classes had no employment in the towns, the mechanics and artisans were reduced almost to a state of starvation. The state of things might be indicated by the fact that last year there were 65,000 or 70,000 people leaving Ireland, notwithstanding the war raging in America, and the awful slaughter of their countrymen in that disastrous contest. He solemnly believed, that if there were peace to-morrow in America, and in this he spoke the opinion of many thoughtful and far-seeing Irishmen, that the next census would not show the population of 1845, which was approaching nine millions, but would show something nearer four millions, and he should not be surprised if it did not far exceed three millions. Three bad harvests in succession would tend to bring down the most prosperous nation in the world, but it was absolutely a crushing calamity to a nation like Ireland. Although the state of the workhouses might be, to a certain extent, an indication of the condition of that country, it was no real proof of its prosperity or adversity, because there was no out-door relief there. Would it not, for instance, be a most fallible test to judge of the number of poor in Lancashire by the number of persons in the workhouse? Yet, in Ireland there was no other test. People would not break up all family ties till they arrived at the last extremity, and many of the people of Ireland would rather suffer the direst torments of hunger than go into the workhouse. There was that sense of pride and decency still existing in the crushed-down people of Ireland, but still the number in workhouses was increasing—the number was larger than last year, and fifty per cent over what it was the year before. He rejoiced that the commercial treaty with France had produced such great results as they were told it had; but he rose with the one object only of telling the Government in the face of the country that the condition of Ireland was imminently dangerous, and he challenged any Member for Ireland to dispute the statements he had brought forward. It was well when the distress in Lancashire was talked of that he should tell the House what was the state of things in Ireland. He made no suggestion on the subject, but the Government were responsible; and the same people of Ireland who sympathized with the distress in Lancashire were entitled to the protection of the English Government and the sympathy of the English people. He believed that employment was the best remedy; but the means of the gentry of Ireland were restricted by the very extent of the calamity with which they had to grapple, and it was to the Government, with the recollection of the struggles and sacrifices of the Irish people to maintain the honour of the British Crown, that they must look for aid in the existing distress.

MR. C. FORSTER said, he was rejoiced to hear of the flourishing state of the revenue, and the country would receive that announcement with great gratification. He thought it unnecessary to remind the Government, in the face of the depression and stagnation now unhappily prevailing in a large portion of the country, that it was their duty to take advantage of the present state of the finances to give to that portion of the community the relief from the pressure of taxation to which they were entitled. His object, however, in rising was to remind the House of a very serious question which must soon command their attention, he meant the Income Tax; and to press upon the Government the necessity of making some provision to meet the just expectations of the country in that respect. He regarded the Income Tax as a powerful engine at the command of the Government to meet emergencies, and for the remission of indirect taxation; but, looking to the present condition of the revenue and the undue amount of that tax, as well as to its unjust, offensive, and inquisitorial character, he felt bound to declare that the time had arrived when it should be materially modified. He was aware that the Committee which was appointed upon the subject had reported adversely to such a proposal, but he warned the Government that the country would not be deterred by the Report of that Committee from agitating the question, and from insisting upon the relief which was justly their due. He knew that there was a deeply-rooted feeling in the country upon the subject—many cases of undoubted hardship had been brought under his notice, and he was anxious, therefore, not to allow the first night of the Session to pass without calling attention to the matter, and expressing his hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the disposal of the surplus, which he believed might be now regarded as a matter of certainty, would direct his attention to the Income Tax as a matter demanding his first notice.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he should not have risen in the course of the present debate but from certain observations made by the noble Lord who had recently spoken (Lord R. Montagu). He did not think that this was a time to discuss the question of the Ionian Islands, as there were papers to be produced in regard to it, when it could be more satisfactorily entered upon and the whole details would be better understood. The noble Lord spoke of the attitude and conduct of the Greek nation in reference to the proposed concession. Now, he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) thought those observations of the noble Lord were most unfair towards the Greek people, who amid the greatest difficulties exhibited the most becoming moderation, prudence, and discretion in their conduct. He was anxious that Her Majesty's Government should inform the House of the negotiations that were going on with the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, as it was of the utmost importance that the present state of uncertainty in regard to the crown of Greece should be removed—whether it was likely that that Prince would accept the sovereignty of that country; and if so, what those mysterious conditions hinted at were, which were connected with the acceptance of the kingly office. After the King left Greece, Her Majesty's Government proposed that a note should be written to the three Powers in the terms of the protocol of February 1830, excluding any member of the reigning families from the Greek throne. It was understood that Russia objected to the note being signed. But the strangest thing was, that it was currently reported in Greece, and generally believed, that Her Majesty's Government suggested Prince Alfred to the Greek nation, or, at any rate, did not discountenance in any way his candidature. Indeed, evidence of this was furnished by the leading articles of the Morning Post, which had long been regarded as the confidential organ of the noble Lord opposite. Some of the earlier articles in that paper were distinctly in favour of Prince Alfred, and were well calculated to mislead the Greek nation. In one of these it was said—

"It is for the Greek nation now to choose whether they will have Liberalism and Conservatism united in the person of Prince Alfred, or whether they will have the uncertainty and dangers which must surround the candidature of the Duc de Leuchtenberg."

M. Drouyn de Lhuys, in his despatch of December 4, says:—"The organs of the English Government supported the candidature of Prince Alfred." The evil that had resulted from this supposition was very great. He understood that the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary prided himself on what he had done; he had taken advantage of the Russian Government, and in this manner he had got rid of the Duke de Leuchtenberg; and he considered that he had practised a clever dodge on the Powers. But they must remember the injury done to the Greek nation by keeping them so long in uncertainty, when it was perfectly easy to say at once that the Government could not accept the candidature of Prince Alfred. Why was not Mr. Scarlett instructed in the first instance to express himself distinctly on that point? Deputations waited upon him daily, and he replied that he had received no instructions. His object, however, in rising was to protest against the language of the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire respecting the Greek nation. The position of the King of Greece was entirely different from that of any other Monarch. He was not elected by the people, but was nominated by the Great Powers on positive guaranteed conditions, which he never fulfilled. The strong monarchical tendencies of the people were shown by the application which they made at once to this constitutional country for a King. In doing so he did not think the Greeks were animated so much by a sense of the advantages which they might obtain from the English alliance as by the knowledge that this country had always carried out a just policy towards them, and that its representatives never took part in the miserable disputes and intrigues which used to agitate the Greek Kingdom. He trusted the noble Lord at the head of the Government would tell them the position of the Duke of Coburg, and allude to the charge that the Government did not discountenance the candidature of Prince Alfred.

SIR JOHN HANMER said, that as a Welsh representative he wished to take that opportunity of saying that the Welsh people regarded with great interest everything relating to the Prince of Wales; and, on the part of the Welsh people, he begged to express their loyalty, their sympathy, and their gratification at the announcement that had been made that day.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he rose to confirm the statement of the hon. Member for Dungarvan with regard to the present lamentable condition of the tenant farmers in Ireland. Successive bad seasons had rendered them unable to pay more than a portion of their rents, and although landlords had allowed them to occupy their farms for two years under these circumstances, they might feel that their first duty was to their own families, and refuse to allow them to continue in possession a third year. Anything like a system of universal ejectment would too probably be followed by an increase of crime and of those unfortunate assassinations which had lately disgraced the country. He did not say that the Government could interfere beneficially by legislative proposals, but they might very fairly consider whether it would not be possible to give extensive employment on works of a reproductive character.

MR. HENNESSY said, he was anxious to express his sense of the state of things existing in Ireland and the impending condition of the country. He wished to make an appeal to the House, not to the Government, for the Government of Ireland was a perfect nonentity—willing, but incapable to do anything. At its head, no doubt, was an accomplished, eloquent, and experienced statesman, but he was surrounded by some half-dozen of the old school of Irish Whigs, who prevented Lord Carlisle from learning the true state of things. The noble Lord was assisted by a Chief Secretary, likewise very able though not experienced, very eloquent, and in that House and in England, he believed, very popular. But of late years there never had been a Chief Secretary of Ireland more unpopular with all classes in that country, or more incapable of understanding Irish interests than the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth. Why the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, who knew more about Ireland than any other Member of the Cabinet, should have selected the right hon. Gentleman to govern that country he could not understand. Everything that indicated prosperity was wanting in Ireland. The population was declining. The money spent in works of a reproductive character was every day diminishing. The quantity of live stock, the acreage of land under cultivation, the money in the savings banks were all in course of reduction. Ireland had 105 Members, not one of whom was found on the Treasury bench. Could the present be called a representative Government, which did not contain a single Irishman? [An hon. MEMBER: Colonel White.] This proved that the people of Ireland differed from the Government as to the policy to be pursued towards Ireland. He was not surprised, therefore, that under these circumstances there was no mention of Ireland either in the Speech from the Throne or in the Address. There was another topic to which he begged to direct the attention of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. England was bound by solemn treaties which had been violated, and the effect of this treaty violation was being felt in a part of Europe in which the people of this country felt a lively interest. He had during the last Session asked the noble Viscount, and he begged now to repeat his question, whether during the Crimean war overtures had not been made by Austria to the Allies with reference to Poland? A most eminent European statesman had authorized him to state that Austria had offered to join the Allies on condition that Poland should be declared independent, and that an army of 100,000 men should be sent into Poland. The present was a moment when England was bound to look into this subject, seeing that England was mainly responsible for the existing condition of Poland. Within the last two years despatches that had been concealed for thirty years had revealed the startling fact, that when in 1831 Poland was in arms to demand the performance of the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna, England refused to join France in using her influence on behalf of Poland. That country exhibited the rare spectacle of a united people. Princes, peasants, the clergy of all denominations, were of one mind, and all desired to see the ancient kingdom of Poland restored. He contended we were bound to ask for this restoration, because the treaty to which we had been a party had been violated by Russia. During the last three or four years the people of Poland had shown more than usual symptoms of nationality. The Russian Government felt that they were about to be beaten by moral force, and they therefore determined to drive the people into insurrection. An order was made for a further and heavier conscription. Some of the municipal bodies remonstrated with the Government, but in vain. The conscription went on, and was directed, not against the lowest, but against the middle classes. In the middle of the night houses were entered, and the young men were sent to Siberia as soldiers. Still the people submitted, and only broke into insurrection when the final insult was passed upon them by the Russian official journal of Warsaw, which declared that the people of Poland took up arms joyfully for the Russian Government, and that they viewed the conscription with satisfaction. We were bound by treaty to protect the interests of the Poles; and when he found they were not mentioned in the Royal Speech, he felt so keenly that he was inclined to move an Amendment to the Address. He trusted that the subject would again come before the House. He believed, that if the people of this country knew of the engagements of England and the present position of Poland they would insist on something being done. He trusted, however, that the subject would again come before the House. Another question which he wished to address to the noble Viscount referred to certain proceedings which had recently taken place at Rome. They had heard that Lord Russell had sent a message to the Pope, and they were also told that the papers would be laid before Parliament. It would be very interesting to know whether the blue-book would include all the papers that had been sent either directly or indirectly to the Pope, because it appeared, from the French despatches on this extraordinary proceeding, that the final act was conveyed by Mr. Odo Russell in a private letter from Lord Russell to Cardinal Antonelli. Now, private letters might be useful in diplomacy, but it would only be fair to allow Parliament to have a glance at that private letter, as it seemed to have conveyed a threat or menace. Now, what was the account of the transaction given by the French Minister? Why, that Mr. Odo Russell, having urged upon His Holiness the propriety of quitting Rome and taking refuge in Malta, concluded by saying that he had reasons for believing that His Holiness would in a very short time find himself under the necessity of doing so. Cardinal Antonelli abstained from making any reply to that communication, and he did right not to make a reply, because the communication did not degrade the Papal Government or annoy them. But it did degrade another Government. When a Government like that of England threatened another Government supposed to be weaker, and when it was known to the Minister who did so that he had not the power to carry out his threat, it was a degradation to the Government whence it proceeded. He (Mr. Hennessey) was inclined to think that such an offer as had been made by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs was a piece of extraordinary hypocrisy, seeing that it had been made by the author of the Durham letter, and that he did it as he said in the interest of the Catholic Church. So profound was the noble Lord's interest in the Catholic Church that he recommended the Pope to quit Rome, and accompanied the recommendation with a threat. English policy on the Roman question from beginning to end had been a disgrace, it had been inconsistent, feeble, and a failure. The basis of that policy had been laid down by the noble Viscount himself. In March, 1849, when the Pope was at Gaeta, and the question was whether he was to be restored or not, the noble Lord laid down the basis of English policy on this subject. On the 9th of March, 1849, the noble Viscount at the head of the Government addressed the following instructions to Lord Normanby:—

"Her Majesty has many millions of Catholic subjects, and the British Government must therefore be desirous, with a view to British interests, that the Pope should be placed in such a temporal position as to be able to act with entire independence in the exercise of his spiritual functions. . . . It seems to Her Majesty's Government that a strong and unanimous manifestation of the opinion of the Catholic powers, in support of order on the one hand and of constitutional rights on the other, would bring to reason the minority who now exercise paramount authority in Rome, and would give courage and confidence to the majority, who have been hitherto intimidated and overborne. Her Majesty's Government have learnt with much pleasure that France has been included in the invitation addressed by the Pope to some of the Catholic Powers, requesting them to take an active interest in the present condition of his affairs. It would be desirable that every endeavour should be made to bring about a settlement between the Pope and his subjects by negotiation and moral influence before resorting to the employment of force."

In another despatch of Lord Palmerston, March 27, 1849, he speaks of "the deep regret with which Her Majesty's Government witnessed the proclamation of a Republic at Rome." All that took place before the French Government determined to send their troops to Rome, which was done in the following month. Now, though he (Mr. Hennessy) entirely concurred with the noble Viscount in thinking that the Pope should be placed in such a temporal position that he would be able to act with entire independence, yet he was not at all certain that any English statesman was justified in meddling in the matter or in laying down the proposition that the Pope must have a temporal position for any purpose whatever. That the noble Viscount was justified in going that length he very much doubted. He had said that the policy built up by the noble Lord was a failure; it was also treacherous, and he thought so for these reasons. While the French troops were at Rome, Cardinal Antonelli, as appeared over and over again from the despatches of Lord Lyons, was anxious that the French occupation should cease, but it could only cease when the Pope had got an army to repel the Garibaldians. What was the conduct of England on this subject? There again she went out of her way. She advised, admonished, and even threatened. At the Paris Conference, in 1856, Count Cavour prepared a memorandum, which was approved by Lord Clarendon, and communicated to Cardinal Antonelli by Lord Lyons. That memorandum stated that it was desirable the Pope should have an army to be composed partly of foreigners and partly of natives. When it was suggested to the Cardinal to increase the strength of the foreign regiments, and if necessary to meet the expense by reducing the number of native troops, his Eminence objected, on the ground that it would show distrust on the part of the Government if the native troops were reduced. The advice of the British Government was followed, except in this respect, that Cardinal Antonelli preferred to have a larger proportion of natives than of foreigners in his army. When Mr. Odo Russell went to Rome, he also urged on the Pope's Government the necessity of employing a foreign army, and, acting on the advice of the British Government, an army was at length formed, and the time came when the French troops might be ordered to withdraw. Many persons would be surprised to hear that notice to quit actually was given to the French troops. On the 22nd of February, 1859, according to the Moniteur, Cardinal Antonelli announced to the Ambassadors of Austria and France that the Papal Government felt itself able to suffice for the preservation of peace within its own dominions; and that they were ready to concert measures with France and Austria for the simultaneous evacuation of the Roman States by their troops. Up to this time the Pope's Government had acted with perfect loyalty towards the British Government. They had raised an army amounting to 18,000 men, composed of two-thirds natives and one-third foreigners. Lord Russell about this time had brought in the Foreign Enlistment Bill, and had defended the employment of foreign mercenaries; and the noble Viscount, when he was Secretary at War, had often proposed Votes for more foreign mercenaries than the whole number of the Pope's forces. Well Count Cavour got an intimation that the French troops had notice to quit, but it did not suit the policy of Count Cavour, and of a greater personage still, that they should leave. The Emperor of the French raised some difficulties, which, however, were cleared away; and Count Cavour then began to make speeches in the Turin Parliament, and to write despatches on the subject of foreign mercenaries. In a short time matters got to such a pitch that the Turin Cabinet sent a despatch to Rome summoning the Papal Government to disband all its foreign mercenaries. And yet Count Cavour, who sent this despatch, was the very person who had suggested the employment of foreign mercenaries. In a few days after, General Cialdini entered the Roman territory with 35,000 men, attacked the army which the Government had formed with such care and labour, and completely destroyed it. The effect of that was that the French troops could not withdraw. The occupation would have terminated long since but for that act of the Piedmontese Government. Every European statesman protested against that act but one, and the only statesman who defended the destruction of the Pope's army was Lord Russell, who had recommended its formation. The policy of the noble Viscount towards the Papal Government would not tend to strengthen our cordial alliance with the people of France. Every one knew that the people of France were completely unanimous on this point, and that they must be deeply offended at the conduct of the British Government. No one would dare to appear on any hustings in France, or wherever the election of deputies were conducted, who approved the policy now advocated by the noble Viscount and who did not approve the policy laid down in his famous despatch of March, 1849. He (Mr. Hennessey) entreated the noble Viscount to make the papers complete, that the people of England might not be supposed to sanction the disgraceful conduct of Piedmont in destroying the Pope's army under a pretext which they themselves created, and that the alliance by which England had something to gain and everything to lose might not be imperilled as the noble Viscount was imperilling it. He had referred to Poland, and he wished to contrast the conduct of the Pope with the conduct of Victor Emmanuel. Two messages arrived in Italy about the same time from the Emperor of Russia. By one the Pope was requested to remove the Polish bishops, who appeared to be patriots, on pain of the Czar recognising the kingdom of Italy. To that request the Pope replied that he was not prepared to interfere with the people of Poland, who, for years, had borne their sufferings with patience and resignation. The other despatch promised the recognition of the kingdom of Italy if Victor Emmanuel would dismiss the Polish emigration out of Italy, and close the Polish schools. General Durando, who was the Foreign Secretary at Turin, in reply, said that the King of Italy had received a despatch in which the Russian Government expressed concern at the presence and conduct of the Polish emigration in Italy, and requested that plots against the integrity of the Russian empire might be put an end to; that the formation of a Polish legion might not be allowed; and that the Polish schools should be controlled. These desires were conformable to the usages established by all civilized nations, and the schools would be closed in July, and not re-opened. The Emperor Alexander was perfectly satisfied with General Durando's note, and sent an envoy to Turin. This was the history of the recognition of disunited Italy by the Czar. The Pope would not interfere with the patriotic sentiments of the Poles; but Victor Emmanuel obtained the recognition upon these conditions, and not, as the noble Viscount had stated, unconditionally. He mentioned this for the purpose of illustrating that in the Papal question the strong power was the Sovereign Pontiff, and the weak power was Victor Emmanuel.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he hoped that an early opportunity would be taken to bring under discussion some prominent topics connected with British India. It was a great misfortune that the members of the Council of India were excluded from the House, as the effect was to make the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India dictator over 180,000,000 of people. With the single exception of the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Vansittart), he was unable to induce any hon. Gentleman to join in the debate at the close of last Session, upon the question of land tenure in India; gentlemen whom he had personally solicited excused themselves on the ground that they were utterly unacquainted with the subject. It was a very good reason for not speaking, and he only wished it was acted upon more strictly on other occasions. As soon, however, as Parliament was prorogued, meetings were held in Manchester, Glasgow, and other large places, where, in strong language and in the presence of persons of influence and position, the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Wood) was stigmatized as perfectly incompetent, and Members of Parliament were required to demand his impeachment or to dismiss the noble Viscount the First Lord of the Treasury from his office. A deputation from one of these meetings waited, in October, upon the noble Viscount at Cambridge House, and they were introduced by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Bazley), who had so ably seconded the Address. It was derogatory to the character of the House that gross charges of misconduct should be made against the right hon. Baronet in his absence and where he could not defend himself, and he felt strongly that those charges, if made at all, ought to be made in Parliament.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—Sir, I am not going to follow all the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken in the course of the evening into the many and desultory topics upon which they have made their observations; but there are a few remarks which I think it my duty to address to the House. In the first place, I am sure the country must be gratified by the manner in which this House has received the announcement of the approaching marriage of the Prince of Wales—a matter of the deepest interest, not only to the Royal Family but also to the whole nation; of the deepest interest for the present and of augury of good for the future. And I may remark that His Royal Highness has been peculiarly fortunate in this respect—that whereas the common fate of Royal marriages has been that persons are contracted together who have had no previous knowledge of each other, and with whom political considerations are the guiding principle of union, in this case the marriage may, in the fullest sense of the word, be called “a love match,” while the amiable and excellent qualities of both parties give the fairest promise of permanent and complete happiness.

The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) who spoke immediately after the Seconder of the Address took a wide range of attack upon the foreign policy of the Government. That appeared to me to be the topic uppermost in his mind. He made broad accusations against the Government—some really, I must say, of a very disagreeable kind. He accused the Government of an intriguing policy. I could not help thinking in my own mind that the right hon. Gentleman must have had a sort of recollection of the policy of some former Government, of which he has, doubtless, more knowledge than of the proceedings of the present Cabinet; or that, by some confusion of ideas, he was reflecting rather upon the conduct of certain leaders of the Opposition than upon that of the Government of the day. All I can say is, that I utterly deny and repudiate the accusation of the right hon. Gentleman; and I will venture to add that there never was an accusation brought against any Government more completely unfounded than that comprised in the words he used. If any proof were wanting of the influence—the just influence—which this country possesses over the opinion of other nations, without intrigue, without any underhand or other than honourable conduct, it would be afforded by that which we have seen lately passing in Greece. The whole nation—not simply that portion of it which inhabits Greece, but also those members of the Greek community who are scattered over every country in Europe—has with most astonishing unanimity declared in favour of a Royal Prince of England, on account of the high character of the Royal Family of England, and on account of the fair and honourable policy which England has pursued. A curious instance of that happened the other day in the Moldo-Wallachian provinces. A deputation of the Greek merchants and other persons residing in one of the towns of those provinces called upon our Consul—a person they did not know except by name—and said their object was to tell him that the Greek nation were unanimous in their desire of having a British Prince as their ruler, because, they stated, of the honest and straightforward policy of England, and because England was the only Power which invariably protected the weak against the strong. I shall take first of all the topic which the right hon. Gentleman referred to in his speech—our relations with China. The right hon. Gentleman found fault with the Government for not having mentioned China in the Speech from the Throne. If there are any papers which anybody wishes to have relating to recent transactions in China, there will be no difficulty in producing them to the House. But the right hon. Gentleman said that the policy we were pursuing in China is inconsistent with that which we originally followed, and is a policy leading us into a Chinese war. The policy we have pursued in China from the beginning is to protect our trade and commerce with that country; and those who know anything of China will not hesitate to admit that our commerce with that country is a most important outlet for the productive industry of these islands. Whence in the outset proceeded the obstructions to our commerce in China? From the Imperial Government. It was the duty of the Government of this country to endeavour to remove those obstructions, and to insist that those rights and privileges to which our subjects resident in China were entitled should be afforded to them. At that time, therefore, we were in conflict with the Government of China. We are no longer in conflict with the Government of China; on the contrary, our Minister and officers there are on the most friendly footing with the Government, which, having its eyes opened to its true interests, namely, commercial relations with European nations, are now desirous of promoting trade and commerce. The prejudices which in former times operated to keep “the outside barbarians,” as they were pleased to call us, from the interior, having been seen to be mere delusions, the barriers which kept us from entering have been removed, and the Chinese Government now does all it can to promote the commercial interests of the empire. Who now are the obstacles?

Viscount Palmerston

The Taepings. My hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Sykes) will forgive me for holding very different views from his with regard to the Taepings. All the information we can get from China goes to show that wherever the Taepings pass peace, commerce, industry, are destroyed. Their course is marked by murder, by bloodshed, by plunder, by everything that destroys commerce and the elements of commerce. But we are not making war against these Taepings, except so far as this—we require them to respect the neighbourhood of those cities in which our commercial establishments are fixed. We are withdrawing troops from China, instead of sending them there. It is true, indeed, that we have authorized British officers to engage in the service of the Emperor of China, to organize in his service and his pay certain small bodies of men who, by drilling and instructing his troops and his navy, may enable him to restore tranquillity in his dominions. You may depend upon it that there is a strong English interest in that. Until tranquillity and order are restored in the provinces of China, we cannot expect that development of British commerce which otherwise could not fail to take place. So much for our policy in China, which is not in contradiction to, or inconsistent with, that which we originally acted upon, but is entirely in unison with it. The result has shown the success of our policy, because we have converted an enemy into a friend, a suspicious and jealous people into friendly and eager traders.

Passing from China, the right hon. Gentleman touched upon the question of Denmark, and he said—which, no doubt, was true, with reference to the person speaking—that he found it impossible to understand or to explain anything relating to that subject. If he had extended that observation to those other topics upon which he dilated, perhaps we should not have been much disposed to question the accuracy of his description of his own comprehension, because he certainly showed in his remarks how essential it is that the Government should do that which they have announced their readiness to do—namely, lay explanatory papers on the table of the House. Here is a right hon. Gentleman of undoubted talent and genius, who has turned his attention very much to these questions, whose study of the ordinary sources of information has brought him into that sort of hazy condition of mind with respect to them, which shows how much he would be benefited by a perusal of the papers which we have intimated our intention to produce. But the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken in supposing that the despatch of Lord Russell, to which he referred, and which appeared in the autumn, was a sudden act, unconnected with anything that passed before, and that my noble Friend suddenly dashed, as it were, into a transaction with which we had no previous connection. The fact is entirely different. We had for several years previously been engaged in attempts to mediate between Denmark and Germany. It had been my lot while in the Foreign Office to endeavour—but, I am sorry to say, without much success—to accomplish that object. Our mediation was invited by the two parties; but they were found so completely at variance, and the question was encompassed by such difficulties, that all that could be effected was a sort of provisional arrangement which prevented the worst consequences of the dispute. But in the course of last year there was a threat of what was called “execution” on the part of the Diet at Frankfort. The Diet of the German Confederation threatened to march troops into Holstein with the object of carrying into effect their view of the matters then in dispute. My noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office prevailed on them to suspend that operation; but in having so prevailed he was bound, at all events, to make suggestions by which a permanent arrangement of a friendly character might be established between the two parties. We cannot say that we succeeded in our endeavour; but that endeavour was a link in the chain, and not a sudden thought unconnected with the transactions that had previously taken place. Papers will, however, be presented on that subject, and the House will then see upon what ground the step was taken to which the right hon. Gentleman adverts.

Then, with regard to Greece, the right hon. Gentleman hopes that we took an early opportunity to inform the Greek Government that it was impossible that Prince Alfred should accept the Greek crown. We did make the fact known as early as occasion required. The very first moment that the Greek nation indicated a desire to elect Prince Alfred we communicated with France and Russia, the other two protecting Powers, and stated our opinion that the Protocol of 1830 was still in force, by which no member of the reigning families of either of the three protecting Powers can ascend the throne of Greece. There was, undoubtedly, some delay, arising, I will not say from an objection on the part of the Russian Government to admit the principle, but from a hesitation to admit its application to the Duke of Leuchtenberg, to whom, however, it was ultimately admitted that it undoubtedly does apply. But the Greek Minister was informed at the earliest possible moment, and by myself, that in our opinion the Protocol applied to Prince Alfred, and excluded both him and the Duke of Leuchtenberg from being elected as Sovereign of Greece. I am asked what is the present state of the question in regard to the Duke of Coburg. I am not able to answer that question, because communications are still going on, the result of which I am not yet acquainted with. The right hon. Gentleman expatiated at great length on the intimation made by Her Majesty's Government of a readiness, under certain circumstances mentioned, to recommend a revision of the treaty by which the Ionian Islands were placed under the protectorate of Great Britain. The right hon. Gentleman really treated that question in a manner that surprised me. He said that the Ionian Islands were by the Treaty of 1815 placed under the British Crown in the same way as Paris was placed under the protection of France. The right hon. Gentleman is not a man who speaks in this House without knowing what he is saying; he knows the value of words and the nature of things; but I was astonished at his making an assertion of that kind. He compared it to Piedmont and to the Prussian Rhenish provinces. Why, he himself stated that which negatived that general assertion. The Ionian Islands were, as he said, six of them, occupied militarily by a British force at the time of the termination of the war, and Corfu surrendered at the downfall of Napoleon. But their fate was determined, like the fate of many of the countries of Europe, by the treaties concluded in 1815; and to those treaties, and especially to the treaty in regard to the Ionian Islands, Great Britain was a party. Well, what did that treaty do? Did that treaty say that the Ionian Islands were to be, what the right hon. Gentleman stated—a British territory, and to belong to the British Crown as one of its possessions? Quite the contrary. It stated that the Septinsular Republic was to be a separate and independent State, but, as a separate and independent state, was to be placed under the protection of the British Crown. But it is no part of the dominions of the British Crown. The Queen is not Sovereign of the Ionian Islands. Our treaties do not include or bind the Ionian Islands. When a treaty of commerce is made, there must be a separate act on the part of the Ionian Islands to give them the benefit of that treaty. They have a separate Legislature of their own; we do not make laws for them. They are to all intents and purposes literally and legally a separate State, forming no part of the British territory or dominions, but under the protection of England, by virtue of the treaty concluded between England and the other great Powers of Europe. Therefore, all the argument of the right hon. Gentleman founded on the supposition that Corfu and the other Ionian Islands were to England what Paris is to France is, if he will allow me to repeat his own words, a perfect absurdity, and has no bearing whatever on the question which the House may have to consider with reference to these Islands. It is not now the time to discuss the policy of making that cession under the circumstances contemplated by the paragraph in the Queen's Speech. My own opinion is that it would be a wise measure. I think it would be a generous measure. I think it is due to that Ionian State, which was placed under our protection for its benefit and not for our advantage. We were bound to do the best for it. I believe we have done the best for it hitherto by maintaining the Protectorate. But I think if Greece is established under an enlightened Sovereign, who will develop her internal prosperity and maintain her external peace, it will be for the benefit of those Islands to be united with their fellow countrymen. I think, too, that it is an example which may not be lost upon other countries. There are other questions pending in the world, in Europe especially, with regard to which an example of generous disinterestedness on the part of Great Britain, for the benefit of those whose fate has been committed to her charge, may not be without result, and I trust it may have a salutary effect on the solution of those questions.

The right hon. Gentleman adverted, as other hon. Gentlemen have done, to certain communications which have taken place in respect to Italy, and especially with respect to Rome and the Pope. Now, the statement which has been quoted appeared in a book published by the French Government, and was contained in a despatch from the French Minister at Rome, which was founded upon a complete misapprehension and misinformation as to what had really occurred. The statement made to the French Ambassador, and by him conveyed to his Government, was that Mr. Odo Russell one fine day asked for an audience of the Pope, and having been admitted, recommended His Holiness to leave Rome and to accept a refuge which the British Government offered him at Malta. Now, the course of the transaction was exactly the reverse of that. It was the Pope who sent for Mr. Russell, and, Mr. Russell not knowing what he was sent for, it was the Pope who in conversation expressed a wish to know whether, in the event of his being compelled by circumstances—which he, of course, did not then think likely, but which were possible—to leave Rome, he would be received and protected in England. [An hon. MEMBER: In England?] Yes, in England. Well, Mr. Russell could not, of course, give any other answer than that he had no instructions, but that it was the custom of the English nation to receive, and hospitably to receive, all those who might from any circumstances feel it desirable to take up their abode in their country. Mr. Russell was then on the point of coming home to England. When he returned in November to Rome he carried a despatch, which was to be communicated to Cardinal Antonelli, in which Earl Russell instructed him to say, that if circumstances should occur which would lead the Pope to leave Rome, and he should not think fit to take refuge in France or in Spain, the British Government would provide for him a suitable residence at Malta, where he would be received and treated with all the respect due to his rank and position. I think that was a proper communication, and it was one that was received apparently with great satisfaction by the Pope, as a proof of the goodwill and friendly feeling of the British Government towards him. The hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessey) has gone into a long dissertation on transactions which took place in the year 1848, and he accuses me especially of inconsistency in the views which

I have at different times entertained in regard to the occupation of Rome by the French. The hon. Gentleman should recollect that the circumstances of 1848 were totally different from the circumstances of the present time. The hon. Member says that the Pope had no army in 1848. Why, if my memory does not very much deceive me, the Pope declared war against the Austrians, and sent his army to assist Piedmont in attacking them. I think I am not mistaken in stating that. But, no doubt, in the then state of Italy, it was thought desirable for the peace of the country that that revolutionary Government which had been established at Rome should cease, and that the Pope should return into the possession of his dominions. I believe there was a great deal of unjust accusation brought against that revolutionary Government. It was a much better Government than that which has since prevailed, but the state of things was very anomalous, and we thought it wise and useful that it should be terminated. It does not follow, however, that because we hold it to be an unobjectionable move on the part of the French in 1849 to restore the Pope, we should think it advisable that the French troops should continue there from that time to this, with the appearance of remaining till Heaven knows when, for the purpose of maintaining a Government which, in our opinion, is distasteful to the majority of the people of Rome. There is no inconsistency in that. At any rate, if we are to be condemned for having approved the entrance of the French into Rome, we may fairly be acquitted of any desire for the continuance of foreign bayonets in that city in order to maintain a Government which the people do not wish to have.

Allusion has been made to certain recent transactions in Brazil. They arose from a just claim for compensation for British losses and injuries to British subjects. The Brazilian Government would not agree to meet that claim until reprisals were commenced. Communications are still going on, but I believe that a satisfactory understanding has been come to on the subject. A very legitimate tribute has been paid by the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. B. Cochrane) to the Greeks for their recent conduct. They have certainly shown as much self-restraint and moderation as the Italians, and higher which no member of the reigning families of either of the three protecting Powers can ascend the throne of Greece. There was, undoubtedly, some delay, arising, I will not say from an objection on the part of the Russian Government to admit the principle, but from a hesitation to admit its application to the Duke of Leuchtenberg, to whom, however, it was ultimately admitted that it undoubtedly does apply. But the Greek Minister was informed at the earliest possible moment, and by myself, that in our opinion the Protocol applied to Prince Alfred, and excluded both him and the Duke of Leuchtenberg from being elected as Sovereign of Greece. tain communications which have taken place in respect to Italy, and especially with respect to Rome and the Pope. Now, the statement which has been quoted appeared in a book published by the French Government, and was contained in a despatch from the French Minister at Rome, which was founded upon a complete misapprehension and misinformation as to what had really occurred. The statement made to the French Ambassador, and by him conveyed to his Government, was that Mr. Odo Russell one fine day asked for an audience of the Pope, and having been admitted, recommended His Holiness to leave Rome and to accept a refuge which the British Government offered him at Malta. Now, the course of the transaction was exactly the reverse of that. It was the Pope who sent for Mr. Russell, and, Mr. Russell not knowing what he was sent for, it was the Pope who in conversation expressed a wish to know whether, in the event of his being compelled by circumstances—which he, of course, did not then think likely, but which were possible—to leave Rome, he would be received and protected in England. [An hon. MEMBER: In England?] Yes, in England. Well, Mr. Russell could not, of course, give any other answer than that he had no instructions, but that it was the custom of the English nation to receive, and hospitably to receive, all those who might from any circumstances feel it desirable to take up their abode in their country. Mr. Russell was then on the point of coming home to England. When he returned in November to Rome he carried a despatch, which was to be communicated to Cardinal Antonelli, in which Earl Russell instructed him to say, that if circumstances should occur which would lead the Pope to leave Rome, and he should not think fit to take refuge in France or in Spain, the British Government would provide for him a suitable residence at Malta, where he would be received and treated with all the respect due to his rank and position. I think that was a proper communication, and it was one that was received apparently with great satisfaction by the Pope, as a proof of the goodwill and friendly feeling of the British Government towards him. The hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) has gone into a long dissertation on transactions which took place in the year 1848, and he accuses me especially of inconsistency in the views which

I have at different times entertained in regard to the occupation of Rome by the French. The hon. Gentleman should recollect that the circumstances of 1848 were totally different from the circumstances of the present time. The hon. Member says that the Pope had no army in 1848. Why, if my memory does not very much deceive me, the Pope declared war against the Austrians, and sent his army to assist Piedmont in attacking them. I think I am not mistaken in stating that. But, no doubt, in the then state of Italy, it was thought desirable for the peace of the country that that revolutionary Government which had been established at Rome should cease, and that the Pope should return into the possession of his dominions. I believe there was a great deal of unjust accusation brought against that revolutionary Government. It was a much better Government than that which has since prevailed, but the state of things was very anomalous, and we thought it wise and useful that it should be terminated. It does not follow, however, that because we hold it to be an unobjectionable move on the part of the French in 1849 to restore the Pope, we should think it advisable that the French troops should continue there from that time to this, with the appearance of remaining till Heaven knows when, for the purpose of maintaining a Government which, in our opinion, is distasteful to the majority of the people of Rome. There is no inconsistency in that. At any rate, if we are to be condemned for having approved the entrance of the French into Rome, we may fairly be acquitted of any desire for the continuance of foreign bayonets in that city in order to maintain a Government which the people do not wish to have.

Allusion has been made to certain recent transactions in Brazil. They arose from a just claim for compensation for British losses and injuries to British subjects. The Brazilian Government would not agree to meet that claim until reprisals were commenced. Communications are still going on, but I believe that a satisfactory understanding has been come to on the subject. A very legitimate tribute has been paid by the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. B. Cochrane) to the Greeks for their recent conduct. They have certainly shown as much self-restraint and moderation as the Italians, and higher praise can scarcely be bestowed on them than by comparing them to that nation. The Greeks have behaved with great good sense, and I trust that when they have obtained a King fit to rule them, and a permanent Government, they will become a prosperous and successful State. Their ancestors were distinguished in every department of intellectual power. They produced the first warriors, the first statesmen, the first poets, the first orators, the first historians, philosophers, painters, and sculptors. I see no reason why the descendants of those great men should not follow in their steps. In the history of nations we find that there is some influence at work, not easily to be explained, by which the people who inhabit a country continue, notwithstanding immigration and changes of population, to exhibit the same qualities; and there is no cause why the Greeks, when they get a good Government, should not become one of the most enlightened and distinguished nations in Europe. It is said that in giving up the Ionian Islands we are changing our policy towards Turkey, and are encouraging the Greeks to be aggressive towards the Turks; we are told, that if we were bent on making a present of them, it should have been, of all the people in the world, to the Turks. That would certainly have been a singular way of changing the distribution of population and the limits of States. But I wish to say that we have not altered our policy towards Turkey. We hope that under the present Sultan Turkey will set her finances in order, and establish a sound Government and just laws, fairly administered to all classes of the people of his vast empire. We trust that Turkey will then become strong both within and without. I certainly cannot see how the union of the Septinsular Republic to Greece can have any tendency to disturb the tranquillity of the Ottoman Empire.

There is one topic which has been adverted to, and which is calculated to excite great regret—I mean the statements made by various hon. Members from different parts of Ireland as to the distress which they say prevails in parts of that country. There is no doubt that Ireland has had three bad years; and no country can endure three bad years in succession without suffering severely. My information, however, does not go so far as some of the statements which have been made to-night. I am told that the potatoes and oats were not generally bad in Ireland last year. The people were also able to save their turf. The crops were certainly shorter than the average, and doubtless there is a good deal of pressure in many parts of the country. I think, however, that some of the assertions which have been made are exaggerated, and, at all events, the appeal which has been made for a grant of money for public works would require to be supported by stronger evidence of its necessity than we have yet received. It is impossible that English Members should not feel deeply for the miseries of any portion of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom. We sympathize as heartily with the sufferers in Ireland as with those in Lancashire. There is, however, this distinction between the two cases, that the misfortune in Ireland is the result of the act of Providence in the ordering the seasons, while that in Lancashire is the result of human causes, which, however, are beyond our control, and were not to be expected.

I am glad that the Address is likely to be voted without more than a discussion upon it; and I will no longer interpose between the House and the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. S. FitzGerald) who, I see, is anxious to address it.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he thought it his duty to direct the attention of the House to that part of the speech of the noble Lord in which he had spoken in praise of the Government of the Sultan and in condemnation of that of the Pope. The former was universally considered to be the very worst Government in the world. He could never have supposed that in a Christian country a preference would have been given to a Mahomedan Government over that presided over by a Christian Bishop; and he thought that that preference had shown a most unjustifiable partiality. The noble Lord had given a very inaccurate version of Mr. Odo Russell's interview with the Pope. The noble Lord had told the House that the Pope had sent for Mr. Russell and had asked him whether, if he were obliged to leave Rome, England would give him an asylum? The statement of the French Minister gave a different description. He (Sir George Bowyer) would tell the noble Lord what really occurred. But first he must remind them that Mr. Odo Russell was not an accredited minister at Rome, but an English agent residing there. Until recently he was Secretary of Legation at Florence, but allowed to reside at Rome. Since that Legation had been abolished he did not know how Mr. Odo Russell could be diplomatically described. [Viscount PALMERSTON: He is attached to Turin.] He is attached to Turin in more senses than one—to the Legation and to the Turin policy. At any rate, he had no diplomatic character at Rome, and could only see the Holy Father as any other stranger or traveller obtained admission to him. And in that capacity, and in no other, did he visit the Vatican. During one of these audiences, as Mr. Russell was leaving, no other person being present, the Holy Father said good-humouredly, but without any political meaning whatever,—"Well, my dear Sir, if ever I am in trouble, I may perhaps ask you for assistance." That was all that really passed. What Mr. Odo Russell wrote home to the Government, the noble Lord knew, and he (Sir George Bowyer) did not; but subsequently, after communicating with the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Russell went back to Rome, and having obtained another audience, told the Holy Father that he was commissioned to state from the British Government that in case he should leave Rome he should have an asylum at Malta; and he went further, and advised him to leave Rome and go to Malta, saying that if he did not do so, he might be compelled—it was not exactly a threat, but very much like one or a warning. Now, what had been the result? Why, it had given great offence to the French Government, for it seemed to imply that that Government was not able to maintain the Head of the Church in his dominions, or that they were going to act in bad faith towards him. But all these matters must be thoroughly sifted. He had the statement of the French Minister. [Mr. ROXBURGH: He was not present at the interview.] His hon. and learned Friend said that the French Minister was not present, but he had the means of obtaining the best information, and there could be no doubt that Mr. Russell made a great mistake, and that the noble Earl (Earl Russell) had deviated from his doctrine of non-intervention which he had professed to act upon. The noble Lord had been pleased to pronounce a great eulogium on the Government of Mazzini and the other Triumvirs at Rome during the republic, and he remembered Earl Russell pronouncing a similar eulogium. He was, however, ready to show that there never had existed a more atrocious Government; for it murdered some of the most excellent and exemplary priests wholesale, merely because they were priests and ministers of religion. A more sanguinary and atrocious Government never existed since the days of Robespierre. The noble Lord had said that the population of Rome was adverse to the Government of the Pope. He denied that most emphatically. Of course there were some discontented spirits in Rome as elsewhere—there was discontent in England even under our blessed constitution, but there were less of them now at Rome than formerly, because the Romans found that they were taxed the tenth part of the taxation of the rest of Italy, and were subject to no conscription. Let the noble Lord look to Naples. There thousands of people had been imprisoned, some of them for two years without any trial, and without knowing the charge against them to the present day. Fourteen towns in the Kingdom of Naples, containing a population of 89,000 had been destroyed by the Piedmontese. The people were driven out of their houses to starve, and to become what was called brigands. These were the loyal people, struggling and fighting against foreign dominion of a most galling and intolerable nature. The British Government had produced, through their influence, a state of things in Italy which was not liberty but enslavement, and they would be cursed eternally for it. [Laughter.] Those hon. Gentlemen who laughed, laughed because they knew nothing of the subject—it was the laugh of ignorance. Let them read the history of that country. When, he should like to know, was Italy great? Was it in the days of her unity? It was rather in the days of the Medicis and—[Cries of "Borgia!"] Would hon. Members, because there happened to be one bad man, ignore the glories of Florence, and Venice, and Genoa, and the great artists and poets which Italy, though not united, produced? The greatness of Italy, he for one should maintain, was due not to unity, but to the national development and the municipal liberty fostered by individual States. He would go further, and say that the unity which would be the result of placing the whole country under the iron heel of Piedmont would turn out to be to Italy not a blessing but a curse. The noble Lord at the head of the Government seemed to imagine that the Roman people were entirely opposed to the authority of the Pope; but in that opinion the noble Lord was grievously mistaken; and if the French garrison were withdrawn from Rome to-morrow, and the Piedmontese prevented from taking possession of it by military force, the rule of the Pope would, he felt assured, be as safe as that of Queen Victoria was in England. Indeed, the sole reason why it was expedient to keep a French garrison in Rome was because she had at her gates a piratical Government which knew no respect for law. The noble Lord did not, perhaps, concur with him in that view, but he should mention a circumstance which had taken place some days before in Turin, which ought, he thought, to make men pause before they endorsed the sentiments which the noble Lord entertained on that subject. An attack was made on the Piedmontese Government in the Parliament at Turin because, it was said, they had not sufficiently encouraged the revolutionary cause in Italy. Count Pepoli, a friend of the Government, however, rose, and contended that they had done everything they could in the direction; adding that Bologna would never have overturned the rule of the Pope if he had not been furnished with very large supplies by his Government at Turin to effect that object. Count Pepoli, moreover, stated that his Sovereign had been so good as to send him from his privy purse a considerable sum with the view of bringing about a change in the Government in Bologna. There was an instance of rebellion being promoted by secret service money, and revolution excited by a Sovereign in a neighbouring State, against which he had no cause of quarrel.

MR. WHALLEY rose to protest against such statements, affecting, as they did, the character of a foreign Sovereign, while they were irrelevant to the subject-matter before the House. ["Order!"]

SIR GEORGE BOWYER contended that he had a perfect right to mention an occurrence which had taken place in the Parliament of Turin, and to show how it supported the view which he had advanced when he mentioned that the Piedmontese Government and Sovereign were conspirators against the peace of other nations from which they had received no provocation. He might further observe that the Romans, seeing discontent prevail in all directions in the territories subjected to Piedmontese rule, were very far from being desirous of being reduced to the same condition. He must also protest against the doctrine that that which styled itself the Liberal party in Italy was entitled to claim Rome as the capital of the country. When, he should like to know, was Rome the capital of Italy? Never. In the time of the ancient Romans Rome was not the capital of Italy in the sense in which it was now sought to make her the capital—she was then rather the conqueror and mistress of Italy. Italy rather belonged to Rome than Rome to Italy. They might as well claim Constantinople because that was once the residence of the Emperors. Rome was the seat of the most ancient dynasty in existence, the dynasty of the Popes; and if the dynasty were overturned, there would be no safety for the Throne of any country in Europe, no matter how long established. If, he might add, any Sovereign had an interest in maintaining a dynasty consecrated by innumerable treaties, it was the Queen of England, who was herself the wearer of an ancient Crown.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, that he should not have risen to address the House at that late period of the evening but that he was anxious that it should not be thought that he avoided the discussion of the subjects alluded to by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, or acquiesced in the manner in which he had treated them. The noble Lord's speech, remarkable as it was for the dexterity with which he had dealt with some topics, was still more remarkable for its omissions. If there was one topic referred to in the Speech of the Royal Commissioners which above all others interested the public mind at the present moment, it was the struggle which was going on in America; yet, notwithstanding that that conflict had inflicted the greatest injury upon a large portion of our population, notwithstanding that there were circumstances connected with it which must appeal to the heart of every man in this country, although it had been made the subject of a most important diplomatic communication from our most important ally, and although the Government had taken upon itself, perhaps wisely, the gravest responsibility in declining to accede to the proposal of the Emperor of the French, yet the noble Lord, in addressing the Commons of England for the first time this Session, had passed over everything connected with the civil war in America and the propositions of France, and, preferring to address himself in a light and jocular tone to other questions, had omitted any reference whatever to this the almost paramount topic of the day. There was another omission which did not altogether surprise him, but which must be rather distasteful to the House. The hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) had again addressed the House upon a subject on which he took great interest, and upon which he had on a previous occasion spoken with great force and ability—the case of Poland. When revolutions were going on in other parts of the world Her Majesty's Government were sure to be found either taking them under their patronage, or, at all events, speaking with commiseration and sympathy of the sufferings which had caused them; but with reference to Poland the noble Lord had on a former occasion, when the hon. Member for the King's County brought forward the subject, devoted his whole speech to an apology for the Russian Government, without one word of sympathy or commiseration for the Poles. Now, the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office could address letters to Denmark complaining that not more than three persons could sign a petition, and that there were restrictions upon the freedom of the press; but when a long-suffering and gallant people were by the proceedings of Russia driven into revolution, and the noble Lord at the head of the Government was challenged upon the subject in that House, he made a reply in which he entirely omitted any reference to the question. The noble Lord had entirely misrepresented the observations which were made by his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) with reference to the correspondence with the Court of Denmark. The complaint was not, as the noble Lord had represented it, that the Government had without rhyme or reason, without any excuse whatever, rushed into a correspondence with the Crown of Denmark on the subject of the Danish Duchies; but it was this—that a persistent and uniform policy having been adopted by the Government of this country in respect to Denmark, and it having been the language of the noble Lord himself that the German Confederation had no right to interfere in the question between the Duchy of Schleswig and Denmark, the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had suddenly, without any reason whatever, changed the whole course of policy, and with all the affairs of his own country and all the business of the office pressing upon him, had sat down and in a very few lines had traced a new Constitution for the kingdom of Denmark. It was all very well for the Government of the noble Lord to say that they were a Government of non-intervention; but that the Foreign Minister of England should sit down and tell the Danish Government that their representations as regarded the state of their own population were utterly inaccurate and fallacious, that he should think it necessary to call the attention of the Danish Government to the fact that in the Duchy of Schleswig only three persons could sign a petition, and that the freedom of the press was somewhat restricted, although probably not so much as in other countries of Europe, and certainly not so much as in Paris—that he should think it necessary to address himself to these petty questions, and reverse the whole policy of England, taking up the cause of the strong against the weak, that he should do this at the very moment when it was of the greatest importance to the interests of this country and of Europe that an independent and strong Scandinavian Power should be raised in the north of Europe—that he should side with Germany in a manner which could only weaken the Danish Crown, and encourage those who opposed the just rights of Denmark to enforce their unjust pretensions by military power—that was the complaint which his right hon. Friend had made, and that was the complaint which the noble Lord had not attempted to answer. He could not omit to notice the extraordinary manner in which the noble Lord had dealt with the question of the cession of the Ionian Islands. A proposition more impolitic, more inexpedient, more unjustifiable, more contrary to the interests of this country and those of the Ionian Islands, and more fatal to the peace of Europe, was never made by any Government of any country. He was not going to take up the position which the noble Lord had unfairly attributed to his right hon. Friend, that the Ionian Islands were part and parcel of the territory of this country. The case against the cession was much stronger, because they were not part and parcel of that territory. Under what circumstances did we hold the Ionian

Islands? The circumstances of the conquest of six of them, and the cession of another, had been accurately stated by the noble Lord and by his right hon. Friend. In the year 1814 the British Government represented to the Plenipotentiaries who were negotiating the Treaty of Paris, that they were alive to the importance and value of these Islands, not to England, but to Europe; they pointed out that, from their geographical position, they might be made the means of aggression and of constant menace, either against the Venetian provinces, against the frontier provinces of Austria, or, what was still more important, against the Turkish empire; consequently, upon the character of the Power which had possession of the Ionian Islands depended the tranquillity of the East; and they proposed that these Islands should be placed under the protectorate of Austria. That was opposed by some of the Powers, and, ultimately, in the year 1815, the Islands were handed over to England, which was to be the protecting power of an independent Republic. At the same time, all the fortresses and strong places were put into the absolute possession and under the absolute dominion of England. He was not fond of referring to Hansard, because public men might change their opinions upon important public questions; but when the expression of opinion was very recent he thought that such a reference was justifiable; and he was now about to quote expressions which were far more eloquent than any which he could use, and in the justice and logic of which he thought that no one could refuse to concur. He wished to refer to the language used eighteen months ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose absence that night they all regretted, and still more the reason to which that absence was attributable. Apart from the distinguished position occupied by the Member for the University of Oxford, his opinion on this question was entitled to the greatest weight, having been sent upon a special mission to the Ionian Islands to inquire into the feelings of the inhabitants and the course of policy which he would desire to see adopted. The right hon. Gentleman expressed himself thus—

"England must look to the exact and regular fulfilment of the obligations which she contracted with Europe. The obligation she has contracted with Europe," he repeated, "was for the benefit of Europe. She undertook that protectorate because it was deemed to be safest in her hands. She contracted then an obligation which she can never surrender until it can be surrendered in a manner that is likely to conduce to the benefit of Europe. I am asked why do we not apply to the other Powers, and see whether they will agree to release us from our obligations. But, Sir, there are conditions preliminary to any such application. You must be convinced in your own mind that it is desirable in the interests of Europe that you should be so released." [3 Hansard, clix. 1687.]

The question was not whether the change would be for the benefit of Greece—and in some of the earlier language of the Government there was considerable vacillation on this point; the question was not whether the transference would be in accordance with the wishes of the inhabitants of the Ionian Islands—and from the information which had reached him he believed that any such change would be opposed to their wishes—but the question was whether it would be for the interest of Europe that the Ionian Islands should be surrendered by England, and surrendered, as the proposition now stood, to a people without any government at all. The importance to Europe of the Ionian Islands was twofold, arising from political and military considerations. Into the military part of the question he was incompetent to enter; but the noble Lord knew very well that there was no officer of distinction connected with either the naval or military service who did not consider the occupation of the Ionian Islands as of the greatest importance to this country in case of war. A despatch of Sir John Young's, which attained great notoriety from the fact of its having been stolen from the Colonial Office, contained the following remarks:—

"The best illustration of the importance of Corfu is afforded by the fact that at the commencement of the Crimean war a Russian frigate and two corvettes were cruising in the Adriatic, and with the knowledge that there was only one vessel in the harbour of Corfu, they did not dare to sail the short distance separating Corfu from Trieste, but preferred to take the vessels to a neutral port, and to send the crews overland to St. Petersburg."

As to the political importance of the Ionian Islands there, were authorities which he did not think any Gentleman in that House would be inclined to dispute. As his right hon. Friend had already stated, those Islands came into the possession of France by a secret article of the Treaty of Tilsit, and it was now clearly known that the understanding was that there would be a partition of the European provinces of Turkey. That was the great object which Napoleon had in that treaty. In the correspondence with his brother Joseph his whole energy was directed to the retention of Corfu, which he spoke of as the key of the Adriatic, as a position without which his great projects of aggression against Turkey could not be carried into execution, as an acquisition which he would not change a thousand times over for the Island of Sicily. If their possession was of such importance to the Emperor Napoleon in 1807, were they quite certain that they might not be turned to advantage by some other Power in our own day? And was it at a moment when the Greek nation was absolutely without a Government and in the throes of revolution, when we knew, that even if a monarchical Government were formed, it must take years before its power was consolidated and its position in Europe asserted—was it at such a moment that we were going to surrender a post declared by the greatest authorities of modern times to be of the utmost political and military importance—such a post to such a people? The noble Lord with great adroitness had passed by one point in the speech of his right hon. Friend, who, after paying a just tribute to the policy which the noble Lord had followed through good report and evil report—that of securing the integrity of the Ottoman Empire—pointed out that this new proposal was in direct opposition to the course which the noble Lord had so long and so successfully pursued. Whether they regarded the dissatisfaction which would be excited in other States, or the discontent that would be stirred up among the Greek subjects of the Porte, the result of the change must be equally mischievous, if not fatal to the Turkish empire. And here again he would quote the words of the right hon Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said—

“I believe it would be nothing less than a crime against the safety of Europe—I might even say against its immediate tranquillity—as connected with the state and course of the great Eastern question, if England were to apply to the Powers of Europe to be allowed to surrender the Protectorate of the Ionian Islands for the purpose of uniting them to free Greece. Consider, again, the bearing of this union, if it took place, upon the condition of what I may call the Greek provinces of Turkey. What are we to say to the people of the Ionian Islands? ‘It is so intolerable that you should remain apart from the kingdom which has its capital at Athens that we will disturb the European arrangement and remove forthwith the protectorate of England in deference to the principle of nationality;’ and could we at the same time say to the people of Candia, of Thessaly, and of Albania, ‘You shall remain not under a Christian protectorate but under a Mahomedan sovereignty, and your desire for nationality shall remain ungratified. A Christian protectorate was too bad for others, a Turkish domination is good enough for you.’” [3 Hansard, clxii. 1688.]

Whether it might be from any desire of popularity, or because the inducement held out would possibly lead the Greeks to attach greater importance to the candidature of a member of our Royal Family, was it fitting that we should refuse to fulfil the sacred obligation we had contracted in the face of Europe, and should take a course with regard to the Ionian Islands imperilling not only the safety of conterminous countries in the East, but running the risk of throwing the whole of Europe into the flames of a long and bloody war? He thought the concluding observations of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) deserved the attention of the House, and he was sure they would impress themselves upon the country. If we were to have a foreign policy vacillating and uncertain, at one time maintaining and at another ignoring the great and important reasons which led to settlements in Europe for the interest of all the world—if we were to disregard treaties—if we were to see the correspondence of the country carried on in the flippant and almost rude manner in which it had been conducted for some months back—Her Majesty’s Government might talk of reduction in the public expenditure as much as they liked without effecting any permanent retrenchment. It was only by the adoption of a policy more in consonance with the faith of treaty obligations—more in consonance with the interests of England—that such a retrenchment could be secured for this country.

Mr. WHALLEY said, that if the Ionian Islands were to be ceded, they could only be ceded after further deliberation and with the consent of the other Powers interested. It was, however, his belief that the policy of the Government in respect to the Ionian Islands had been adopted quite irrespective of any views connected with the candidature of Prince Alfred or of any member of the Royal Family. His principal object in rising, however, was to deprecate the making that House a platform for the exposition of statements regarding the Pope and his affairs. He was convinced that the hon. Member for the King’s County (Mr. Hennessy) and the hon. Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer), had been entirely imposed upon in regard to the statements they had been induced to make.

Motion agreed to.

Committee appointed,

To draw up an Address to be presented to Her Majesty upon the said Resolution:—Mr. CALTHORPE, Mr. BAELEY, Viscount PALMERSTON, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Sir GEORGE GREY, Sir GEORGE LEWIS, Sir CHARLES WOOD, Mr. MILNER GIBSON, Mr. CARDWELL, Mr. VILLIERS, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Sir ROBERT PEEL, The LORD ADVOCATE, Mr. PEEL, and Mr. MASSEY, or any Five of them:—To withdraw immediately.

Lords Commissioners' Speech referred.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, February 6, 1863.

MINUTES.]—Took the Oath.—The Viscount Hawarden.

REPORT OF THE VOLUNTEER COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

LORD LLANOVER asked the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether it was the intention of the Government to propose any measures during the present Session for the purpose of carrying out the recommendations contained in the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the Volunteer Force of the country? He said he apprehended that if the recommendations of the Commission were about to be carried out by Her Majesty's Government, the introduction of a money Bill into the other House of Parliament would be necessary. In that case, he ventured to recommend that the measure of the Government should be brought forward as speedily as possible, in order to remove the uncertainty which at present prevailed.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose to Parliament measures for substantially carrying out the recommendations of the Volunteer Commission. For this purpose it would be necessary to include a sum of money in the annual Estimates, and to introduce a Bill into Parliament proposing an alteration in the existing Volunteer Acts. He thought it was not altogether expedient that he should then enter into details which would be better explained when his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War moved the Estimates in another place, and he trusted that it would be sufficient, in order to allay the feeling of uncertainty which had been stated to prevail on the subject, to announce that measures were about to be introduced for the purpose of carrying out substantially the recommendations of the Commission.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, that he concurred with the Commissioners in thinking additional aid to the Volunteers was necessary, in order to preserve the force for the service of the country. He was further of opinion that the system of fortifications adopted for the defence of our arsenals afforded an additional reason why the Volunteer movement should be kept up. We could not now afford to lose 150,000 men who, in case of war, would be very useful in manning the fortifications. He would impress on his noble Friend the Under Secretary for War that every precaution should be taken to insure that the money voted by Parliament as aid towards the maintenance of the Volunteer force—if Parliament should sanction a public expenditure for that purpose—should be carefully and strictly applied to the purposes for which it was intended, and that no money should be paid to any man who did not attend those instructions and exercises which were necessary to make him efficient as a Volunteer. He thought that in recommending nine days' drill only, the Royal Commission were rather below the mark. His own opinion was in favour of a higher requirement; but the majority thought that with the checks which were proposed, and the supervision of the commanding officer and of the adjutant, nine days would be sufficient. In all the other recommendations of the Commission he entirely concurred; but with reference to another force, the Militia, he might be forgiven for expressing a hope that they would in future be trained for twenty eight days, as recommended by the Militia Commission. He was afraid he should be told that financial considerations stood in the way, but he was certain that the efficiency of the force very much depended upon this requirement.

LORD TRURO said, that one of the objects for which the Commission was appointed was to make inquiries into the present condition of the Volunteer force. He certainly thought that the utmost praise was due to the Commissioners for the assiduity and industry they had manifested; at the same time, he must say he thought that passage of the Report in which the Commissioners expressed their gratification in being enabled to state that the present condition of the Volunteer force was, generally speaking, satisfactory, and the annual subscriptions sufficient to meet the expenditure, was hardly consistent with their recommendation that they should receive pecuniary aid from the country. If the annual expenses of the force had generally been defrayed by its own members, and were sufficient to maintain it in a satisfactory condition, it did not seem to follow that pecuniary support by the country was required. He would observe also that his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief had impressed upon the Volunteers the great necessity of attending company drill, and on one occasion was even reported to have said that the Volunteers had better be in their drill yards than making attempts at complicated field evolutions. Now, the Commissioners, out of the nine days of attendance, recommended that six should be days of battalion drill, and three of company drill. He should have thought it more consistent with the advice of the Commander-in-Chief that six of the drills should be company, and three battalion drills. He condemned their knowledge of the subject when they laid down thirty drills for recruits in the Infantry and Artillery—those of the latter service having to learn not only company and battalion drill, but gun drill also, to which twenty-four drills out of the thirty were to be devoted. Another recommendation of the Commissioners was that any adjutant who might be employed as a paymaster should be responsible for all money received by him on account of the Volunteer force being expended in strict accordance with the army regulations; but those regulations expressly prohibited adjutants from dealing with the money at all. The public had hitherto given but slender support to the Volunteer force, and no one could doubt that the grant of Government aid to the Volunteer force would tend to diminish rather than to increase annual subscriptions and donations for the future. The noble Lord also reprobated the determination not to allow the Volunteers the use of light artillery, which in case of war would be found to be a great mistake. On what principle this had been done he could not imagine.

In answer to Lord VIVIAN, EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to carry out the new regulations which had been recommended by the Royal Commissioners to adopt. Those corps which might wish to expend any portion of the grant in clothing would be required to conform themselves to a certain definite rule. At present the Government had but one pattern of grey clothing, and it would no doubt be necessary to have others; but, at any rate, it would be necessary to follow the patterns adopted by the War Office.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

SAILORS' HOMES.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY TRACEY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If it be the intention of Government to take under its consideration the subject of Sailors' Homes generally, with a view to aid those whose means are not adequate for their object, and which in its judgment may be deserving of assistance?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET replied, that it was not the intention of the Admiralty to propose to Parliament any Vote for Sailors' Homes beyond the usual Vote for those in the vicinity of the Dockyards.

THE OUTRAGE IN BRAZIL.

QUESTION.

MR. LAIRD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any objection to lay before the House Copies of all Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and Mr. Christie, British Minister in Brazil, and between Mr. Christie and the Brazilian Government, relating to the wrecking of the Prince of Wales, and the alleged ill-treatment of three Officers of H.M.S. Forte by the police of Rio Janeiro; also, of any Despatch from the American Minister in Brazil to Earl Russell respecting the conduct of Mr. Christie, or of Mr. Vereker, late Her Majesty's Consul at Rio Grande do Sul?

MR. LAYARD: In answer to my hon. Friend, I beg to state that the papers which relate to the differences between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Brazil are being prepared, and will be laid upon the table with the least possible delay. As regards the despatch from the American Minister, that despatch relates entirely to a private affair of a painful character, and no good could arise from laying the paper on the table of the House. As I am on my legs, the House will perhaps permit me to make a short statement, strictly confined to facts, regarding the matters in difference between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Brazil, especially as those facts have been much misrepresented and much misunderstood. In the month of June, 1861, Her Majesty's Consul at Rio Grande do Sul heard that Señor Soarez, a Brazilian magistrate, had mentioned in conversation that some dead bodies of Englishmen had been washed on shore on the coast near his dwelling at Albardao, but had denied that there had been any wreck. This led to inquiries being made, in consequence of which Her Majesty's Consul found reason to believe that a British ship had been wrecked on the coast of Albardao, and that that wreck had taken place some days previous to the conversation in which the magistrate in question took part. The suspicions of the Consul were further excited by the fact that no inquest had been held upon the bodies, and no information had been given to him by the authorities as to the wreck. He accordingly proceeded to the spot, in company with a judicial officer and a coast-guard. On arriving there, he went to the house of Señor Soarez, the magistrate, who was absent. His visit was evidently not very acceptable; and in the house was found some portion of the cargo of the wrecked vessel which had evidently not been in the sea, but had been removed from the vessel and brought on shore without being damaged by sea water. On the following day the British Consul went to the coast, and found the remains of an English vessel. The sands were covered with cargo, some part of which was damaged by the sea, but a very large part of which was not so damaged. The chests had been broken open and rifled of their contents; and the Consul heard that ten bodies of Englishmen had been found on the beach. He accordingly desired to see those bodies, but the inspector of the district appeared inclined to resist the attempt; and being at the head of a body of armed men, the Consul was obliged to submit. He therefore returned to Rio Grande; and having, after some trouble, obtained from the authorities orders that the bodies of the English seamen should be brought to Rio Grande, he (the Consul) having, however, to bear the expense. Instead, however, of ten bodies being brought, only four could be obtained. On those bodies a very unsatisfactory inquest was held, and a remonstrance was made with respect to the non-production of the other bodies. Upon those bodies the authorities directed an inquest to be held, but no person from the Consulate was present, and the persons appointed to hold the inquiry were the sub-delegate and the brother-in-law of the magistrate implicated, as it was suspected, in the wreck of the vessel—

Lord ROBERT CECIL rose to order. He desired to remind the House that there was no question before it. The hon. Gentleman seemed about to cast imputations of a very serious character upon persons in a foreign country; which he ought not to be permitted to do, at a time when no answer could be given.

MR. LAYARD: I am entirely in the hands of the House, and will act in accordance with its wishes; but my hon. Friend (Mr. Laird) came to me this morning and expressed great anxiety on the part of himself and his constituents that some explanation of this matter should be given in the House before the departure of the mail on Monday next.

MR. SPEAKER: The usual course is to permit a Minister in replying to a question of this description to enter more into detail than would be deemed right in the case of a private Member. At the same time, it is a matter for the exercise of discretion in the Minister. He should avoid expressions which may call forth observations from other Members, and excite debate.

MR. LAYARD: I will carefully avoid making any comment, but will merely state the facts on which her Majesty's Government have acted. The dead bodies to which I have alluded, were found some distance from the shore, and there were grave reasons for suspecting that some of the sailors had been murdered. On this a demand was made for further inquiry and redress. It was not until the 18th September that any steps were taken by the Brazilian Government. One person was then tried and convicted of stealing some of the property. This was not considered sufficient by Her Majesty's agent, and a further inquiry was demanded, but that demand was not complied with until the month of August in the following year. Early in August Mr. Christie requested that an inquiry might be held, at which a British officer should be present. That the Brazilian Government refused. On the 4th August it was announced that two minor officials, whose conduct had been justified, had been dismissed for culpable neglect previously; but no step was taken with regard to the principal offender, Señor Soarez. After various ineffectual attempts to obtain redress, Her Majesty's Government felt it absolutely necessary for the protection of British interests to take the steps which had been resolved upon under this painful necessity. Instructions were given to Mr. Christie to demand reparation, and if that were refused, to give orders to the Admiral commanding the squadron at Rio to make reprisals. In the mean time, in the month of June, great indignities were offered to two officers and the chaplain of Her Majesty's ship Forte, for which reparation was demanded, but not given. Instructions were accordingly given to the British Admiral to make reprisals, on refusal of the Brazilian Government to accept the ultimatum presented by Mr. Christie demanding the settlement of both questions. Upon the action of Admiral Warren, who seized five Brazilian vessels, the Brazilian Government agreed to give damages to the owners of the Prince of Wales, and to refer the other question to the mediation of an arbitrator. Mr. Christie, acting under his instructions, accepted the offer of the Brazilian Government, and the five vessels which had been seized were then restored. I am happy to state that Her Majesty's Government, having the utmost reliance on the wisdom and justice of the King of the Belgians, have accepted him as arbitrator in the matter of the Forte, if His Majesty should deign to accept the proposal. As regards the Prince of Wales, the Brazilian Government have agreed to pay, under protest, a certain sum by way of compensation, and that offer has been accepted. By the last accounts from Rio the excitement which had been occasioned by the seizure of the Brazilian vessels had ceased, and I trust that the matter has now been arranged satisfactorily, and that the amicable relations which ought to exist between the Government of Her Majesty and that of the Emperor of Brazil will be restored.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY ON THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS' SPEECH.

REPORT.

Mr. BAZLEY brought up the Report of the Address in answer to the Lords Commissioners' Speech.

MR. BENTINCK said, that in former times, when it was not intended to offer any opposition to the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne, the opinion of the House was generally considered to be expressed by the speeches from the front benches. That was the case in the days when the House was divided into two great parties. But he ventured to think that the union and action of party could only be harmonious and effective when the organization of party rested upon principle; and he for one thought that, unfortunately both for themselves and the country, the occupants of the front benches on both sides of the House had for some years past been in the habit of sacrificing principle to expediency—though he did not think that the expediency upon which they had sought to act always promoted the object in view. It appeared to him that they had come to that pass when the occupants of the front benches neither exercised a very large influence over the opinions of that House, nor fully represented the opinions of the people of this country. There was no other resource, therefore, for private Members but to trespass on the patience of the House, and he would do so on that occasion with the view of making a few remarks on the topics referred to in the Royal Speech. The subject which seemed likely to occupy the largest share of the attention of the House was the proposed cession of the Ionian Islands. He should be very sorry, in the present state of the proceeding, to commit himself to any opinion as to the course he might think it right to take upon the political part of the question. He would only observe that it seemed to him so important and intricate as to require the gravest deliberations before coming to a decision upon it. It seemed to him that during the whole time these Islands had been under our protectorate we had never exercised our power advantageously for the islanders, and the consequence was that our whole system of government had provoked undisguised aversion. We had been endeavouring to palm a constitution upon a people that was utterly unfit for it, and which had made all attempts at the Government of these Islands utterly ineffectual and ridiculous. During the debate of last evening great stress had been laid upon the military part of the question. He understood the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire to say that he thought that in a military point of view the possession of the Ionian Islands was essential to the interests of the country. That was a very difficult question. If it had been put to him (Mr. Bentinck) thirty years ago, he should have inclined to the view of the right hon. Gentleman; but it appeared to him that circumstances had entirely changed, and that the introduction of steam had so altered the system of warfare that he was disposed to doubt whether, in case of war in the Mediterranean, we should derive any great military advantage from the possession of these Islands. The right hon. Gentleman had said truly that power was a source of national wealth, and that this nation ought to possess strongly-fortified posts in particular positions. But it must be remembered that these strong places could not be maintained and held except by strong garrisons, and he wanted to know where these were to be found in the reduced state of the military armaments of the country, and what prospect there would be of our maintaining secure possession of these Islands if our armaments—if the term “bloated” could be applied to them—were to be reduced, and our military resources were to be diminished? If the cession of Corfu was to be made an argument for the reduction of our military establishment, he should regard the cession as a disadvantage; but supposing that the result of the discussion on the question of the abandonment of the Protectorate of these Islands should be to approve that course, he hoped they would obtain a large military force for the defence of other military posts now very ill-garrisoned. Another question of the greatest importance had been adverted to yesterday. The fortresses of Gibraltar and Malta were incidentally referred to in connection with the Ionian Islands. He thought there was no affinity whatever between them. The House knew how they came into possession of the Ionian Islands, but the retention of Gibraltar and Malta stood upon an entirely different footing, and he thought that any man who advocated their cession must either be imbecile or a traitor to his country; and he trusted that, if such a proposition were made, it would be scouted by the almost unanimous opinion of the House. Much had been said on what was going on in the United States, and he was certainly a good deal surprised that the noble Lord at the head of the Government should not have thought proper to advert in any way to this subject. He thought he might securely venture to say that a great change of opinion had taken place in this country during the last two months with respect to the state of things on the other side of the water. In March last he (Mr. Bentinck) ventured to suggest the propriety of recognising the independence of the Southern States. He ventured to say that, though at that time he did not receive any support in that House, yet he believed, if the matter were now to be brought forward, the proposal would meet with a very different reception. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Address (Mr. Calthorpe) had referred to the change of opinion which had taken place with reference to the nature of the war now going on between the Northern and the Southern States of America, and as to its being a struggle for the maintenance or abolition of slavery. He (Mr. Bentinck) believed it was utter cant to assert that this was a war for the abolition of slavery, and that the people of this country generally had arrived at the conclusion that the question of abolition or non-abolition had nothing to do with the war. We were now in possession of the real merits of the case, and we knew that the question of slavery was not the bone of contention between the North and the South. The people of this country to a man had a distaste for the institution of slavery; and if they thought that to be the real cause of the war, he believed the strong feeling of sympathy towards the South would not have existed in the minds of his countrymen.

The hon. Gentleman had also reminded them that after expending £20,000,000 upon the abolition of slavery we had refused to maintain the duty on slave-grown sugar because it was in contravention of the principle of free trade. He was glad to hear that observation come from the other side of the House, because it showed that there had been a great deal of cant upon that subject. So far as concerned the conduct of the South it was impossible to help admiring their gallant bearing and their heroic defence. This struggle, at all events, had taught them one great moral lesson, and that was, that under American democracy all the men of highest repute for education, ability, and character, were excluded from an influential part in the government of the country. Another topic of the Address was the great and wide distress that had existed for many months past in this country. No man could refrain from saying that it had been borne in a manner most creditable by those who were the sufferers, and no one could fail to admire the immense amount of benevolence that had been called forth. It behoved the House, however, not to allow themselves to be misled on this question. He ventured to think—for he had heard it stated over and over again by those who had the best opportunity of forming an opinion—that this distress was not caused solely by the stoppage of the cotton supply from the United States, but that much of it was to be attributed to the over-speculation and over-production of the great mill-owners. They were naturally anxious to turn their capital to the best account, but they had not been sufficiently mindful that their power of production was unlimited, while the markets of the world were limited. This was a subject of grave consideration for the Government; because, if the distress arose, as was generally assumed, solely from the absence of a supply of cotton, they might hope soon to see it terminated; but if this distress had been in a great degree caused by the over-speculation of the great mill-owners, it behoved them to look more closely into the matter, for the same cause would periodically bring about the same result. It would be well not to encourage over-production. He did not wish to say one word in derogation of those who had borne their sufferings so bravely in Lancashire and Cheshire, but he regretted that in the Royal Speech no allusion was made to the distress existing in other parts of the country, for there had also been great suffering in Warwickshire, in the metropolis, and in Ireland. He wished to know why the Government should have reserved all their sympathy for the manufacturing districts? When the time came for paying a proper tribute to those who had done so much to meet the wants of the distressed operatives of Lancashire, it would be necessary to inquire whether those who had distributed the funds—beyond doubt a difficult task—had exercised their powers with sufficient discrimination, for there was danger lest a state of things should be brought about which would induce a portion of the population to prefer a state of idleness to one of industry. Various topics had been introduced to the attention of the House in the Speech from the Throne, and even the question of Reform had not been forgotten. He was not now going to dwell upon it, though there were many hon. Members who were fond of talking of Reform when there was no prospect of its being effected. He wanted to know, however, whether Reform meant anything but an attempt on the part of one portion of the community for their own benefit to have the control of the incidence of taxation. If the question of Reform were to be considered, taxation should be taken into account with it. The contest at this moment going on between the North and the South was in truth nothing more than a discussion, something roughly carried out, of a Reform Bill. He hoped it would be borne in mind at the present moment that there was one great existing grievance to be remedied—that was that the present representation of the rural districts was wholly inadequate. The result was, that at that moment the rural districts bore a larger share of the taxation of the country than was their due. He hoped, if a distinguished Reformer should arise, that he would bear in mind the gravity of this existing grievance.

MR. LOCKE said, he did not quite concur in the theory of the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), that a new Reform Bill should be founded on a supposed excess of taxation paid by the agricultural interest. His constituents, who belonged chiefly to the working classes, contributed largely to the revenue of the country. For example, the tobacco smoked by the poor man was taxed at 3s. 2d. per lb. weight, whilst cigars sold at 50s.

per lb. bore only a duty of 9s. The same inequality might be found in the duties affecting tea, sugar, and other articles of necessity. He thought, therefore, that the working classes had a right to ask that such questions as these should be considered with reference to any Reform Bill that might be submitted to the consideration of the House. On the other hand, he thoroughly went along with the hon. Member for West Norfolk in his observations regarding the Lancashire distress. He should like to know from those Gentlemen who represented localities in the north of England what was the course which had been adopted in the manufacturing districts in respect to the Bill which was passed at the end of the last Session of Parliament—he alluded to the measure which enabled those localities to rate themselves in a way best calculated to relieve the distress which fell so heavily upon the working classes in those districts. As far as he understood, there were only a few instances where the rates had risen to the amount of 3s. in the pound, when the Board of Guardians had availed themselves of that Bill. It was provided that in such an eventuality the parishes concerned could obtain a rate in aid. Now, he believed that the measure in question had never, with one or two exceptions, been acted upon. There were many parishes in the metropolis whose normal state was a poor rate of 3s. in the pound and upwards. A Bill was a short time ago brought into the House with the view of effecting an equalization of the poor rates in the metropolis. It, however, obtained no general support then, as it was objected that such a measure was opposed to the principles of political economy. Now, he did not think that political economy had any more to do with that particular question than it had with the principle of the Poor Law in general; and he contended that the measure which was passed at the end of last Session to relieve the distressed districts was one which in effect adopted the principle of equalization of rates for the relief of the poor. A Committee sat last Session on the question of Poor Relief, when evidence was given on the subject of equalization of rating to the relief of the poor, and he supposed it would continue its labours this Session, and he trusted the Government would turn their attention to the subject, with a view to the equalization of the rates, not in the metropolitan district only, but throughout the country. He made those observations for the purpose of drawing the attention of the House and the Government to this question of the equalization of the poor rates, which he considered to be one of the most vital importance. The Act of last Session was a step in the right direction. Subscriptions, however, had come in most liberally for the relief of the operatives, and the several Boards of Guardians had chosen to accept the contributions of the benevolent rather than adopt a course which would have thrown a heavier local taxation upon themselves.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he must express his regret that the Government had not thought it advisable to introduce into the Speech from the Throne any allusion to any one subject which was generally connected in the minds of the people of this country with the liberal party. In their foreign policy he concurred, nor was there one count in the long indictment brought against the Government last night upon which he should not be inclined to pronounce a verdict of acquittal. Even on the difficult question of Schleswig-Holstein he thought it would turn out that the solution proposed by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office would prove to be the only solution which would prevent that long-standing and embittered controversy leading to a bloody war. But had the country arrived at such a point of political development that nothing remained to be done at home, and that all the energies of the Government must be employed in extending the blessings of constitutional Government to other nations? Such an assertion might be refuted by the example of Holland, a country much in advance of Great Britain in some material points of political development. He rejoiced to learn that there was some prospect of a reduction in the expenditure. Reduction of expenditure was a good thing; but for this few thanks were due to the Government. The House had to thank, in the first place, the convictions of the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), and next the tactics of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). How did it happen that not one of the questions brought forward by the liberal party, and supported by them upon divisions, was alluded to in the programme of the Government? He thought it was the general opinion of the country that the question of Reform should for the present be laid aside; but there were many other questions which the Government might have taken up—for instance, the question of church rates, which year after year had been dragging its slow length along, and which now seemed further than ever from solution. Then there was another question—a Clergy relief Bill, which ought to be brought forward by the Government; for without some such measure being passed into law they would see the pulpits of the Church of England filled by a set of men who would have no relation whatever to the once learned and refined clergymen of that Church. What he complained of now was that the Government were not bringing forward any measures: it was not that they were to have half a loaf, but that they were to have no bread. The Government might say that they were willing to remain in office for the purpose of conducting the foreign affairs of the country, and of saving Europe from the calamity of having such a statesman as Lord Malmesbury for our Foreign Minister; but, in his opinion, the constituencies would support them in a bolder line of policy.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, he could not share in the regret expressed by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, that Her Majesty's Government had not promised to bring in measures which would have recommended themselves only to a section of the House. With respect to church rates, he had himself given notice of his intention to introduce a Bill on that subject, and he should rejoice if its provisions were of such a character as to secure the approval of Her Majesty's Government. He fully concurred in the opinion of the hon. Gentleman that the time had arrived for a settlement of this long-agitated question. It appeared to him that the present condition of the question opened a breach through which the enemies of the Church of England could approach the chief stronghold of our ecclesiastical establishment. He could not concur in the terms of the Address which echoed the sentiments of congratulation expressed in the Royal Speech upon the operation of the French Treaty. It was impossible for him to forget how it had affected the riband trade, and that this was the third winter during which he had been compelled to labour for the alleviation of the distress of the industrious classes around him, and that the French Treaty was in operation during the whole of that time. No one therefore could expect him to join in those congratulations to which he had referred. If the treaty had benefited the great mass of the community, he could only say he rejoiced at it. He had never opposed the principle of a treaty with France. Such a treaty as that concluded by Mr. Pitt was undoubtedly of the greatest possible advantage to this country; but he was sorry to say that the present treaty with France had imposed a heavy weight upon the shoulders of the constituency he represented, and from which very many thousands of honest men would, he believed, never recover. He hoped, then that the House would allow him, as far as his constituents were concerned, to except himself from joining in that portion of the Address to which he had referred. Her Majesty, in Her Royal Speech, had alluded to the fact that she had concluded a commercial treaty with Belgium. Now, it should be recollected that the products of Belgium come into competition with the products of the looms in his district. He had repeatedly brought before the House the fact that the conditions of the French Treaty were not reciprocal as regarded both countries; for whereas the conditions relating to the whole category of duties abolished in the treaty under the fifth article were absolute, the conditions for the admission of the products of Great Britain into France were qualified. The effect of such an arrangement was, as he had frequently stated, that England was bound to receive the produce of the whole world coming under the category of the article No. 5 duty free; whereas France was only bound to receive the produce of the United Kingdom, not of the Colonies, and that under a scale of duties which France under the treaty had the power to modify. If he were right as to his apprehensions of the effect of the fifth article of the French treaty, he wished to know whether the commodities imported under the category of the article No. 5 were not duty free under the operation of that treaty, and whether or not it was possible to modify the duty on the produce of Belgium and other countries under the said treaty? He was aware that the present Lord Chancellor when Attorney General, gave it as his opinion that the conditions of the French Treaty were in this respect reciprocal—that it was only the produce of France and Algeria that came under the provisions of Article 5 of the treaty. But he was advised by competent authorities that that opinion would be disputed, in consequence of "the most favoured nation" clause. If we were, then, to form treaties with other countries, and that "the most favoured nation" clause were introduced, he was afraid we should be found totally impotent as regarded other countries, because we should be precluded by the terms of the French Treaty. He trusted that the Government would at the earliest period lay the text of the Belgian Treaty before the House. In the general tenor of the Address he cordially concurred. He felt he would be wearying the House if he were to express the depth of the feelings of gratification which, as an individual, he experienced at the prospect of happiness which had dawned upon the Royal Family. But he wished to express his conviction distinctly upon one point, and it was this. He thought that the greatest praise was due to Her Majesty's Government in reference to the proposal that His Holiness the Pope should take refuge within the British dominions, should he be compelled to leave Rome. He thought that that offer by Her Majesty's Government was characterized by a due courtesy and a sound discretion. In 1861 he drew the attention of the House to the fact that rumours were afloat to the effect that in the event of the Holy See becoming vacant or of the Pope abdicating his functions, or leaving Rome, it was proposed to convene an œcumenical Council in this country. It was further rumoured that Cardinal Wiseman was to have exercised the functions of His Holiness, and that a successor to the Pope was to be appointed. This report was circulated principally on the authority of the Indépendance Belge. Now, this was an important matter. If an œcumenical Council were convened in this country, a vast number of foreigners would be attracted hither in consequence, and the Roman Catholic priesthood might be excited to the commission of acts which would be seriously resented by other parties. Such a feeling of irritation would be then likely to arise as would far exceed that which existed in 1851. He wished now to express the opinion that Her Majesty's Government, in answering the question put to them, whether English hospitality would be afforded to the Pope in the event of His Holiness being obliged to leave Rome, had replied in a wise and courteous manner, and that the site indicated by them as a residence for the Pope was a site well chosen as regarded not only his own interests, but also the interests of the United Kingdom.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that with respect to the cession of the Ionian Islands he entirely agreed with the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), but he wished to know whether Her Majesty's Government had considered the question of the cession of the Islands in reference to the communication with India? In the event of a war with France, the route from England by Marseilles would of course be stopped, and the Adriatic would then be regarded as the direct route to the Indian possessions of this country; but if the Ionian Islands were given up, they would either be occupied by the enemy or become the resort of vessels which might cut off our communication with the Indian Empire. The Adriatic in time of war was a great battle-field for naval operations, and notwithstanding the different motive power now applied to vessels, it must still be an important position, and he could not regard the cession of the Ionian Islands as other than detrimental to this country, and he should oppose the measure as far as it was in his power to do so. Had the Secretary of the Admiralty been in his place, he should have put a question to him with respect to the iron ships now building; but he should take an early opportunity of inquiring what was the model which was to be finally adopted. Observing that the senior Naval Lord of the Admiralty had gone down to Devonport and informed the constituency that the iron fleet at present constructed consisted of exceedingly fine ships in every point of view, and were highly reported on by the Admiral on the Lisbon station, yet that "these," according to the words attributed to the Senior Lord in The Times, "would not form the model to be finally adopted," he gave notice that he should take an early opportunity of asking the Government what model had been finally adopted, and whether they had adopted any precise and definite views in reference to the construction of the iron fleet of this country. There was another point not mentioned in the Queen's Speech, but which must soon come under the consideration of the House, and on which the Government would have to explain their policy—he alluded to the renewal of the Galway contract. That was the most extraordinary circumstance that had happened within his recollection. It would be remembered what a great amount of political capital had been made out of that question, and that hon. Gentlemen now sitting on the Opposition side of the House had been vilified on account of the grant of that contract. He was told, indeed, that an hon. Gentleman had been made a Baronet in consequence of having held up that contract to execration. Yet, if the contract was at any time necessary, it was at the period of its grant, when there was a large efflux of emigration from Ireland to America. But now that that emigration was reduced to a small figure the contract was restored. Was that done with a view to a general election? The present Government availed themselves of every means of vilifying the Administration of Lord Derby by condemning that contract in every possible way for three long years, and yet now, on taking up The Times one fine morning, people discovered that the Galway contract was restored. What was the reason of that? If he was rightly informed, the terms on which the contract had been restored were of a most extraordinary description. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were once opposed to a sliding scale, but those who formerly stood up for free trade now recommended differential duties on various articles of commerce. They were all sliding back to the old thing; but the sliding scale he now spoke of had reference to speed. He was told that under the new Galway contract, if the vessels made $10\frac{1}{2}$ knots an hour, the Government were to pay so much; for nine knots they were to pay another sum, and the scale went down to eight knots. Now, if a vessel, only capable of going eight knots an hour, were to cross the Atlantic against a westerly gale, she would not be likely to reach her destination at a very early period, and he was informed that some houses in the City had on this ground remonstrated against the arrangement. He should be glad to hear on an early day an explanation relative to the Galway contract.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he wished to avail himself of that opportunity of calling the attention of the House to a question involving a sum of £500,000, and the conduct of the Government in reference to appointments in the Colonies. The colony he referred to was New Zealand. If he were to say that they were spending £500,000 a year there uselessly, or were engaged in an unjust quarrel with the Native chiefs, he should expect to be counted out; for, on a former occasion of the kind, he had found every possible difficulty thrown in his way, of which he had great reason to complain. They professed that the Natives of New Zealand should have the rights of British subjects, yet they were overborne in the exercise of them, the Governor had been allowed to interfere in matters affecting private property, and to disregard the rights of individuals; and upon a war breaking out, for which the public of this country had to pay, complaints from the colony were unheeded and justice was not done. What he now specially referred to was the fact that the Government of this country had guaranteed a loan of £500,000 on the recommendation of a Committee, which recommendation was founded on evidence which was the reverse of the truth. The Governor, who had done all the mischief, was removed; but because he had abused his trust in one office he was appointed to another. And in the mean while the colony had been left in a state of chronic disorder. Thus the British Parliament became responsible for all this bad government. He could assure the House that there was a most serious case to be inquired into, and that they would be wanting in duty if redress were not given.

MR. HIBBERT, referring to the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke), that the unions in the distressed manufacturing districts had not made large use of the Act passed last Session, said, that he (Mr. Hibbert) knew that out of the nineteen or twenty unions which constituted the distressed cotton districts, ten or eleven were in a position to avail themselves of the Act. He knew also that since the Christmas quarter two of these unions had availed themselves of the rate in aid upon the counties of Cheshire and Lancashire, and five unions were availing themselves of the borrowing Powers of that Act. Therefore, it was scarcely fair to say that sufficient use had not been made of the Act of last Session. At the same time, however, he was well aware, that had it not been for the great sympathy which had been shown towards the distressed districts, many more of these unions would have come under the rate in aid. As one of the representatives of that district he was glad to take that opportunity of thanking the nation for the admirable manner in which it had come to the relief of their fellow-countrymen in their distress, and he could assure the House that Lancashire would be found willing, whenever appealed to, to contribute to the relief of distress which might be found to exist in any part of the United Kingdom. The Act of last Session, however, should have justice done to it, and he had no doubt that before twelve months were over it would be of great assistance to the people of Lancashire in enabling them to meet the distress which was still pressing upon them.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, that it was by no means an easy task to draw up a Royal Speech in which a great variety of subjects were to be touched upon, without at the same time raising opposition in some quarter; and in the endeavour to secure the concurrence of all parties, not only much diplomacy was displayed in dealing with different subjects, but matters of importance were sometimes omitted altogether. To adopt a figure of speech—usually termed an Irish bull—it sometimes happened that the most important parts of the Speech were its omissions. There were, however, one or two subjects in which the public had been interested lately, to which some allusion, he thought, might with propriety have been made. One of those subjects, the Home Secretary would say, was already referred to a Commission; he alluded to that of transportation and secondary punishments. He was not at all anxious to go into the question; but in his experience of Parliament and the ways of Government he had had occasion to remark that Commissions were often appointed for two very opposite purposes. One was to elicit most valuable and complete information, by means of an investigation for which a Commission was more competent than a Committee of the House of Commons, and thus to lay a foundation for sound practical legislation. But there was another object for which Commissions had sometimes been appointed, and that was the evasion of a subject altogether. That was one of those dexterous acts of Government which were not altogether unfamiliar to most of them. He did not think that the Commission on the question of transportation had been appointed with any such intention. The question was a grave one, and called for serious discussion; and, according to the general feelings of the country, there was a call for some great change in legislation—a change which he thought could not be avoided. It was a subject which could not be lost sight of, and what he wished to observe was, that the Government should endeavour, at as early a period of the Session as practicable, to bring the labours of the Commission to some sort of conclusion, and to place in the hands of hon. Members materials for legislation in the course of the present Session. There was another subject, the absence of which was a noticeable feature of the Speech, and that was the much-voiced question of Reform. Even his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. White) had not proposed an Amendment to the Address because of the omission, being deterred, no doubt, by his former ill success. He hoped the omission was because Her Majesty's Ministers were convinced that throughout the country there was absolute indifference to the question. There was no pressure on the Ministers, and therefore he hoped they would not move in the matter; and, indeed, the noble Lord at the head of the Government was perhaps not much inclined to start this organic question. There had been a battle raging in different parts of the country as to whether or no there had been a Conservative reaction—whether there was a turn in the tide, or whether there was still only a little lull, and the great Reformers were only retiring that they might jump forward with greater vigour. In one sense there was no reaction whatever. A great number of very important measures had been carried in the course of the last thirty years; and on none of these questions was there any disposition in any quarter of the House or the country to retrace their steps. To some of those measures the Conservatives gave a consistent and steady opposition. In respect to some they admitted candidly they might have been mistaken in their estimate of the results that might follow from them. There were other measures which they still thought did not work well. But he did not think that in the Conservative ranks, any more than on the other side of the House there, was any desire for change; they were ready to accept the existing state of things. There was a general feeling in the country against pushing democratic reforms too far; and he thought that those Gentlemen who were considered the leaders of democratic progress in this country, if they were candid and acknowledged the truth, would admit that there was a disposition now to remain tranquil. The number of those who cheered them was fewer, and the cheers were less vociferous. So far as he had been able to observe from significant speeches of hon. Members to their constituents, the former were sensible of the influence of this spirit of Conservatism, and also felt that there was a disposition, even on the part of those who sat on the same side of the House as themselves, not to push reforms farther. These Gentlemen acted judiciously for the promotion of their own cause. He elicited from their speeches that they began to contemplate getting more out of the Conservative side of the House than they got from their own quondam friends. It appeared to him that these hon. Gentlemen were beginning to follow the historical example of the Prætorian Guards of the Roman Empire, who put the empire up to auction, and sold it to the highest bidder. He really thought that they were showing great dexterity, great knowledge of human nature, and that they were wise in their generation, considering that they were a minority in the House and not a large one, and that in the present state of parties they could make either the Opposition or their old friends a majority, and thus to a certain degree held the scale in their hands. He saw the policy of such a course; and he had no doubt they would carry out the policy with perfect consistency. What he did not see was any possible gain the Conservatives could have in lending themselves to such a combination. The Conservative party, whether in or out of office, had but one course to pursue, and that was to maintain Conservative principles. Twice in the course of the last few years a Conservative Administration had attained a brief tenure of office, and the results of that experience must have convinced the Conservative party that to accept office whilst they were in a minority in this House was not to further Conservative policy, and did not tend to elevate the Conservative character. He believed that if the experiment were made at the present time by the Conservatives of governing the country, it would be injurious to their character, their position, and the reputation they enjoyed in the country. He believed that gradually, certainly not quite so speedily, but eventually with much greater stability, the Conservative party would again be at the head of affairs. He believed they would be at the head of affairs because they would gain the confidence of the constituencies at large; and that they would be supported by a clear and undoubted Conservative majority in that House. That day would come; perhaps it might not be a very distant day, but he was quite sure that the great majority of the Conservative party would never wish again to accept office until that state of things arrived.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to make a few observations with regard to the events in the Levant and the proposed cession of the Ionian Islands. He wished to know how the cession of these Islands to Greece was reconcilable with the policy pursued by Her Majesty's Government, particularly by the noble Lord at the head of it—a policy which he had pursued at all periods—the policy of maintaining the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire? A country like Greece commanded the affection of all enlightened and educated people. It had recently made a revolution, in which the inhabitants had deposed the Sovereign given to them thirty years ago; and now we were making them a present of this territory which had practically formed part of the British dominions since 1815. The Ionian Islands were given to us to hold because they excited the ambition of other great Powers of Europe, who at one time or other had possessed them, to protect them from the recurrence of those attempts, and they had been practically treated as part of the possessions of the Crown of England. In fact, it was not till 1848, when that unfortunate power of self-government was made over to them upon the wildest democratic principles, by a Government of which the noble Lord was himself a leading Member, that any difficulty was found in dealing with them. Now, as regarded the integrity and independence of the Turkish empire—that political formula with which the noble Lord's name was associated—how was it likely to be affected by this surrender? We were giving the Greeks an extension of territory, with a fortress which we had made one of the strongest in Europe; and then they were told that they were to put it to no use; whereas the use which they would consider legitimate would be to recover some part of their ancient possessions. The fortress of Cerfu fronted immediately the Turkish territory of Albania, from which it was separated by a strait so narrow that it might be crossed in a fisherman's boat. Then they told the Greeks a contradictory story—in the one case, that they gave them these Islands, and in the other, that they were to have them but not to make use of them; and yet the only use the Greeks could make of Corfu would be to attack the country of Albania, which is in a chronic state of rebellion against the Turkish Government. Looking, then, at this session as so contradictory in itself, and so eminently opposed to the conduct of the noble Lord in regard to the fortress of Belgrade, he could not regard it as an emanation of that perfect wisdom which came from judgment and calm deliberation, but as one of those expedients by means of which Governments from time to time got out of difficulties that occurred to them. He quite concurred in the generous feeling that had dictated this act on the part of Her Majesty's Government; but having regard to the fact that the Government of Greece was not particularly stable or sufficiently powerful to protect them from the aggression of other Powers—for nobody could say that Russia or France might not pounce upon them—he was bound to consider the proceeding as more a matter of generosity on the part of the Government than an act of wise statesmanship, or as the result of the deliberate opinion of the country, or even of the more intelligent portion of the Ionians themselves. Then he would like to ask, if it was the constitutional doctrine of the prerogative of the Crown that a Minister acting for the Crown can give up any portion of the territory belonging to it without ascertaining what the feeling of the Parliament and the country is—if that were so, was it a desirable thing to do it? Could they give away Canada in the same way? He contended that they were by no means to take as conclusive and authoritative the proceedings of a Government during the recess, when no longer subject to the supervision of Parliament, and that all such matters must be left entirely open to be dealt with as Parliament may think fit. Turning to another subject, he thought with the hon. Member for Radnorshire (Sir John Walsh) that there could be no greater delusion than to suppose that there was a Tory reaction in this country, or that there was a disposition in the country to support the Conservative party, except on the understanding that it would act in a reasonably Liberal spirit. Any chance indication, such as an individual election, might be a false barometer of the public feeling. There could be no doubt that the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) was personally popular with the country—a result due to a great extent to his great physical and intellectual activity at a venerable stage of human existence; and this was shown by the fact that when a Member on that (the Opposition) side of the House offered himself for election he declared that he would not offer any factious opposition to the noble Lord. The only pledge that ever he took himself was something of that kind, which he had endeavoured to fulfil always in so far as it was compatible with public utility. Therefore, he warned them against that epidemic delusion which came up at the end of last Session, should it rise again, that no such combination as that of the Gentlemen on his side of the House with the Radicals would succeed. He believed that the Tory and Radical cross, if attempted this Session, would be a complete failure. He believed that it belonged to those who were not Radicals, and yet did not go for Tory domination—that is to say, for the independent Members—to turn the scale if any such combination as was attempted last Session should be tried again. If those two parties had any principles at all, no two elements ought to be so dissimilar. They did not, of course, know what might be in prospect this Session. There was a lull at present; but he did not think that any such patched-up combination as that to which he had referred—comprising the most dissimilar elements—would be likely to succeed.

Address agreed to:—To be presented by Free Councillors.

THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS' SPEECH.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Motion, that the House at rising do adjourn till Monday next.

POOR REMOVAL.—QUESTION.

MR. HERBERT rose to ask the President of the Poor Law Board the Question of which he had given notice, Whether any Circular has been addressed by the Board calling the attention of Boards of Guardians in England to the provisions of the Act 24 & 25 Vict., c. 76, relating to the removal of Irish Paupers from England to Ireland; and, if so, whether he will have any objection to lay such Circular upon the table of the House? The subject was one of very great importance, both to this country and Ireland. It would be remembered that during the Session of 1861 two Acts passed—one altering the law of removability which was applicable to English and Irish paupers seeking relief, and the other regulating the mode of removal of poor persons from Ireland to England. In the English Poor Law Report presented last Session he found detailed at considerable length the particulars of the Acts passed relating to the change made in the law of irremovability; but there was no trace in the Report or Appendix of the President of the Poor Law Board having called the attention of boards of guardians to the Acts relating to removals from England to Ireland. He was the more astonished that no notice should have been taken of that Act because he could not suppose that his right hon. Friend who showed such a laudable anxiety for the passing of the Acts of last Session should have allowed them to have been totally inoperative. He presumed, therefore, there was some circular or notice taken of this Act by the President of the Poor Law Board, which he had not thought it necessary to embody in his Report. So far back as the 30th of November, 1861, a correspondence took place between the Irish Government, the Home Office, and the Office of President of the Poor Law Board, in which the Irish Poor Law Commissioners said—

"It was not until some time after the passing of the recent Acts that any removal to Ireland took place under them. Removals are now, however, beginning to be frequent; and the Commissioners regret to say that among the 29 cases which have come under their notice, involving the removal of 67 persons to the present date, there are very few in which some irregularity or disregard of the law is not apparent on the face of the proceedings, sometimes attended with injustice and loss to the unions in this country, and in other cases with hardship to the persons removed. Considering the great importance which, under existing circumstances, this system of pauper deportation may assume, the Commissioners think it their duty to present the cases referred to in detail, with copies of the several warrants of removal which have been received, in the hope that possibly some step may be taken in order to secure greater attention to the actual state of the law on the part of the removing authorities in England."

He would only quote one case as an illustration of many—the case of Catherine

Griffin, removed from Leigh, in Lancashire. In the month of March she was placed on the deck of a steamer, which, at that season of the year, was contrary to law, and left drenched on the quay at Dublin, to find her way to the workhouse, where she and her children remained a burden on the North Dublin Union, the guardians having no redress, although, being a native of Ennis, she ought to have been removed to the union near Limerick. On the 29th January, 1862, the Poor Law Commissioners wrote to the Under Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant complaining on the subject and urging the necessity of some change. They said—

"The total number of cases now reported is 46, and the number of persons included 98, which, added to the number previously reported, makes 75 cases, including 165 persons. It will be observed that the more serious irregularities noticed occur in the cases of removal from parishes or unions in the London metropolitan district, inasmuch as those provisions of the recent Act which were intended to secure a proper custody and delivery of the pauper in Ireland, and to prevent women and children being sent by deck passage during the winter season, appear in that district to be almost uniformly neglected."

His right hon. Friend (Mr. Villiers) asked whether that letter had been addressed to the Poor Law Board; and he replied it certainly was not, but it was referred to them; and had they been able to controvert any of the statements it contained? He held in his hand the reply of Mr. Fleming, the English Poor Law Secretary, dated "Poor Law Board, Whitehall, January 22, 1862," and it was in these words—

"I am directed by the Poor Law Board to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st ult., and the documents which you therewith forwarded to them by direction of Secretary Sir George Grey, relative to the operation of the recent statute, 24 & 25 Vict., c. 76, with regard to the removal of poor persons from England to Ireland. The Board direct me to state that they have carefully perused the several documents which were forwarded with your letter, and that they regret to perceive that in many of the cases adverted to great irregularities have occurred in the proceedings of the justices and of the boards of guardians in England in regard to the removal of poor persons to Ireland. It would not be within the province of the Poor Law Board to express any opinion upon the conduct of the justices with regard to the irregularity of their proceedings in such cases; but as the guardians of the several unions in England have not yet become fully aware of the requirements of the new statute, the Board propose shortly to issue a circular letter to boards of guardians in which they will point out the new provisions of the law with regard to Irish removals and the course which ought to be adopted in effecting the removal of the Irish poor who have not acquired settlements in England and are removable to Ireland."

He could not but believe, therefore, that some circular letter to boards of guardians had been issued pointing out the provisions of the law with regard to Irish removals; and, if so, he hoped it would be produced. On a future occasion he should be able to show that the system complained of was still in full operation. The letter concluded thus—

"With regard to the violation of the provision in the 6th section of the 24 & 25 Vict., c. 76, the Board trust that such violations will be of unfrequent occurrence. If, however, contrary to the Board's expectations, they should become frequent, they think it would become necessary to consider whether an Act should not be passed imposing a penalty, recoverable on summary conviction, upon persons who may be proved guilty of infringing the statute."

He would therefore beg to add to the Question of which he had given notice, Whether it was the intention of the President of the Poor Law Board to propose any such remedy as is here suggested to remedy the abuses complained of?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he regretted that his right hon. Friend had not given him notice of the cases of ill-treatment to which he had referred, because he should have felt it his duty to direct immediate inquiry to be made as to them. The Act in question was one of such great notoriety at the time of its passing that it was thought unnecessary to call attention to it. It was very simple, and, as he thought, not at all likely to be misunderstood; and the Poor Law Board, consequently, had thought it unnecessary to issue any special instructions as to the manner in which it was to be carried out. If the English guardians and justices did not comply with its provisions, it was no special duty of the President of the Poor Law Board to notice it. The irregularity might be brought to the notice of the Poor Law Board, and inquiry would be immediately instituted; but the Board were not responsible for the neglect of duty on the part of persons whose business it was to apply the law. They were in the same position as any other persons who neglected to enforce an Act which it was their duty to apply. There had not been any cases brought under his notice of the description alluded to by his right hon. Friend. If the hon. Member would give him the dates of the cases to which he had referred, he would cause full inquiry to be made.

Mr. Herbert

COLONEL DUNNE was at a loss to know to whom an appeal was to be made in such cases if not to the Poor Law Board. He had opposed the Act from the first, knowing perfectly well that it could not be fairly carried out. The cruelty of these deportations was on the increase.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the law respecting the removal of Irish poor was precisely the same as that which applied to the case of English and Scotch paupers. He believed that in every case of removal the greatest possible forbearance was manifested. Frequently Irish poor refused to tell the part of Ireland to which they belonged. In many instances, in a strong Irish dialect, they declared that they knew nothing whatever of Ireland. Consequently, several of them remained for months in a workhouse before the place that was chargeable with their relief was discovered. The parochial officer took great pains in such matters; he adopted various steps to ascertain the facts, and stated upon his oath before the magistrates his belief that the information he had obtained was correct. Frequently Irish paupers refused to be sworn when questions were about to be put to them as to their place of birth, &c. Irish paupers were a great burden upon English parishes.

After a few words from Mr. FULLER,

Motion agreed to.

House, at rising, to adjourn to Monday next.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. WHALLEY, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill "for diminishing the expense attending the passing of Bills relating to Railways and affording facilities for obtaining ample and trustworthy information thereon," said, that he had brought the subject before the House so far back as 1853, and he was then told by the hon. Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson Patten) that the subject was being inquired into, and that it was unnecessary to make any Motion upon it at that moment. The present system occupied the time of some of the best Members as Chairmen, and of a great number of other Gentlemen as members of these Committees, and greatly interrupted the discharge of their ordinary Parliamentary duties in the House. The result of the inquiry by the Committee of 1858 was to show a unanimous concurrence of opinion that the present tribunal was attended with almost every possible inconvenience and disadvantage. The proper principle was to refer such investigations to a department of the Government, subject, of course, to a review of their decisions by either House of Parliament. It was now some twenty-five years since the Tithe Commissioners were first appointed. Questions of far greater moment than even the important questions in relation to new lines of railway had been referred to the Tithe Commissioners; and yet such were the means adopted for checking and controlling the operation of the law that there had never been any substantial complaint of the way in which they had exercised the powers intrusted to them. Twelve years ago the subject of enclosures was referred to another Commission, constituted upon the model of the Tithe Commission, and that part of the private jurisdiction of the House was withdrawn without dissatisfaction and without complaint. The year before last another step in the same direction was taken in reference to piers and harbours. He now thought the time was come when something ought to be done in defence of the interests of those parts of the country which were not already provided with railways. The practical effect of the present system was to render it almost impossible for any local company to get powers to make a local line. In the case of a company of this character, of which he was chairman, they expended £86,000 before they obtained their Bill to construct a line eighteen miles in length. They had to prepare plans, to give notice to every one who could possibly be affected, and to contest the scheme before Committees of both Houses, because one great company feared that they might be indirectly injured or that their great rival might be benefited. It was scarcely possible to conceive anything better adapted than the present machinery to prevent the investment of money in the improvement of districts at present unprovided with railway accommodation. Mr. Hope Scott, who had had great experience of railway contests, said he always gave his clients a stereotyped answer—

"I can't advise you absolutely upon your prospects of success. There is so much uncertainty that all I can say is, I think you have a chance."

His proposal was almost identical with the course pursued in France and other countries, and was in strict conformity with the opinion of the experienced men who gave evidence before the Committee of 1858. It was, that promoters should send a short prospectus, stating the estimated cost and general course of the line, to the Board of Trade, that the Board of Trade should direct an inquiry to be made whether the proposed Railway was wanted, and that, if it appeared to be necessary, the Board of Trade or other Department, for which the Government would be responsible, should issue a provisional order, upon which the promoters should direct a survey to be made and notices to be served in accordance with the present Standing Orders. When the proper Department had by these means been thoroughly satisfied not only that the line was required, but the plan and all the other essential matters had been properly arranged, he proposed that exactly the same course as had for thirteen years been taken by the Enclosure Commissioners should be adopted, and that a Bill should be sent to that House to enact that a railway should be constructed in accordance with certain plans. The House would then, of course, be at liberty to revise the whole matter as they thought fit, but as a matter of course the measure was not to go before another Select Committee. Such was the object of the Bill which he now begged to move for leave to introduce.

MR. HADFIELD expressed his approval of any proposition the effect of which would be the lightening of the heavy expenses to which railway companies were subjected in passing Bills through the House. There was one notorious case of a railway, the engineering and law expenses in connection with which amounted to £680,000. One indefensible part of the expense was the enormous fees paid to the "leading counsel" practising before Parliamentary Committees, who very frequently, if they carried out their engagements, ought to appear before half a dozen Committees at once, while able men in stuff gowns were to be secured whose services would be in reality more efficient, inasmuch as they could attend to the cases which they undertook. The consequence was that very few barristers gave their exclusive attention to any one case, and it would be far better for the clients if they could have the services of men in stuff gowns than have to fee gentlemen in silk, who would undertake the advocacy of any number of cases and attend to none. It was an undeniable hardship that a man, whose property was about to be interfered with by a proposal for a railway, should be obliged to present himself before a Committee to defend it, and to incur the great expense of seeing counsel, and actually paying for reporting the evidence on his own side and the House fees in addition. He hoped the Bill of the hon. Gentleman would have the effect of providing a remedy for that state of things.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN thought that cheap law was about as bad a thing as possible, and he thought that to carry on a local inquiry on the spot where the persons differently interested resided would be the worst possible thing that could take place. As to the fees to counsel, it was for the public to judge the value of the services of counsel, and not for Parliament to meddle with small details of this character. He protested against such a suggestion that these gentlemen were not entitled to the remuneration which the public were willing to give them. They were men of great ability and learning, and afforded the Committees very great assistance, such as could not be obtained from any attorney ill-informed on these subjects who attended on the spot. Though not a member of the Bar now, he had been, and protested against this meddling interference with that which was a free-trade principle, and which secured to men eminent in their profession what had been called a high rate of remuneration.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the question of the emoluments of counsel was not embraced in the measure now proposed by the hon. Member for Peterborough. The hon. Member proposed a scheme for diminishing the expense of Railway Bills; and if he could devise a scheme to accomplish that end consistently with security to the land-owners and the various other interests affected, he would undoubtedly confer a great benefit on the country. He (Mr. Milner Gibson) thought the House ought to give the hon. Member leave to introduce the Bill; but he did not consider it probable that the House would part with the powers it now exercised in private legislation to so great an extent as proposed, without deliberate inquiry into the subject. He should like, before expressing any opinion, to have heard the views of those hon. Members whose great experience in Private Bills, and the attention which they had given to these subjects, entitled their opinions to great weight. It was possible that his hon. Friend would be able, from the consideration he had given the subject, to frame clauses in a Bill which would form the basis of a good scheme; and he thought, therefore, they should allow his hon. Friend to submit his measure to the consideration of the House.

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT said, that there were no doubt evils in the present system which it was very desirable, if possible, to remove, and if the hon. Member for Peterborough should succeed in devising a scheme to remove them, he would deserve the thanks of the country. The great object which they ought to endeavour to accomplish was to diminish the expenses which the prosecution of those Bills now entailed. But he would warn the hon. Gentleman that the constitution of a private tribunal for deciding those cases would not lead to the attainment of that end. If the new court of inquiry was to partake of the character of a system of arbitration under which inquiries were to be made upon the spot where the works were to be constructed, it would, he believed, be found even more expensive than the present Committees of the House of Commons. A local inquiry had been instituted in the case of a water-works scheme at Reading, and he believed the parties were anything but satisfied with the result. He thought it very desirable that they should direct their attention to the subject, and that they should for that purpose proceed to a consideration of the Bill which had been brought forward by the hon. Member for Peterborough; but if they were to pass any measure in the case, he hoped that measure would be made to extend to Private Bills of every description as well as to Railway Bills.

MR. WHALLEY replied.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for diminishing the expense attending the passing of Bills relating to Railways, and affording facilities for obtaining ample and trustworthy information thereon, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WHALLEY and Mr. M'MAHON.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 6.]

CHURCH RATES ABOLITION.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY moved for leave to bring in a Bill to abolish Church Rates. He understood that there would be no opposition to the measure at that stage of the proceedings, and he should not, therefore, at that moment trouble the House with any observations upon the subject.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN TRELAWNY, Sir CHARLES DOUGLAS, and Mr. DILLWYN.

DRAINAGE OF LAND (IRELAND).

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

COLONEL DICKSON, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to the Drainage of Land in Ireland, said, it was not necessary for him to dwell upon the details of the measure, which was similar in most respects to the Bill which he introduced and which was discussed last Session. There were, however, two points of difference between that Bill and the present. One was a power to borrow money under the provisions of the Bill, and the other a power to make alterations in the bridges over the waters proposed to be drained. He regretted to say that great distress existed in Ireland—distress peculiar to itself, and which fell heavily at periodical seasons upon the people. He hoped he would be distinctly understood as not asking for charity; but he meant to say the distress in Ireland was such as no person in this country could have any idea of. It was distress such as no description of his could exaggerate, and was beyond the means of the resident gentry to remedy. He did not ask for any temporary assistance—that they obtained in former times, but instead of its having been employed as it ought to have been, it was, on the contrary, expended in the most extravagant manner to the amount of millions. If they could get a power to borrow money, great good would arise to the unemployed labouring classes of Ireland. He therefore begged to move, in conclusion, for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. HENNESSY seconded the Motion.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in replying, on the part of the Government, to the observations made by the hon. and gallant Member, said, that as he understood the Bill to be similar, in most respects, to that brought in last year, and recollecting that the Bill had been well received by the House, he should not offer any opposition to the Motion. There were, however, several points in the Bill of last year, particularly as regarded the limits of drainage, which were deserving of serious consideration. With regard to the power of borrowing money, he might observe that within the last fifteen or twenty years money Bills had passed through that House in relation to the draining of land in Ireland, and amending previous Bills; and if his hon. Friend should be more successful than others in the objects he had in view, he should be very glad to assist him in carrying out those objects.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Colonel DICKSON, Colonel FRENCH, and Mr. HENNESSY.

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND).

MR. M'MAHON moved for leave to bring in a Bill to assimilate the Law of Ireland as to Salmon Fisheries to that of England.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he did not rise to oppose the introduction of this Bill; but a great deal of agitation existed in Ireland in relation to the rights of parties in the upper and the lower waters, and in relation to that part of the Bill he thought his hon. Friend might expect to meet with considerable opposition. He could only say, if the question could be satisfactorily defined and settled, great advantage would be gained. He therefore trusted that in the framing of the measure his hon. Friend would avoid, as much as possible, going into those questions which interested parties might look upon as a proposal amounting to a confiscation of their rights.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. M'MAHON, Colonel DUNNE, Colonel FRENCH, and Mr. LONGFIELD.

QUALIFICATION FOR OFFICES ABOLITION.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved,

That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to render it unnecessary to make and subscribe certain Declarations as a Qualification for Offices and Employments.

Resolution reported.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. HADFIELD, Sir MORTON PETO, Mr. BAINES, and Mr. KERSHAW.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS.

Endowed Schools,—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved,

That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Endowed Schools.

Resolution reported.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. DILLWYN and Sir CHARLES DOUGLAS.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 3.]

JUDGMENTS, &c. LAW AMENDMENT.—Bill to amend the Law relating to future Judgments, Statutes, and Recognizances, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HADFIELD, Mr. LOCKE KING, and Mr. POWELL.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 5.]

House adjourned at half after Eight o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, February 9, 1863.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

"MY LORDS,

"I SINCERELY thank you for your loyal and dutiful Address.

"It is particularly gratifying to Me to be assured that you participate in My Feelings on the intended Marriage of the Prince of Wales, and in the Confidence that by God's Blessing this Event will Conduce to the Happiness of My Family and the Welfare of My People."

CHARITABLE ENDOWMENTS.

QUESTION.

LORD WROTTESELY inquired, Whether the Government propose to introduce any Measure for the Purpose of carrying into effect the Recommendations of the Education Commissioners in reference to Charitable Endowments? The Question related to a subject of considerable importance and interest. It would not be difficult, to show that both the education of the poor and their general welfare might be advanced by an improved administration of our charitable endowments. Having acted for several years on a Commission of Inquiry into these charities, and having been a Member of various Committees to which were referred Bills for the establishment of a permanent Charitable Commission, he had read with great interest that part of the Report of the Education Commissioners which described the present condition of those endowments, and suggested measures of reform. The evils and abuses there described were not new to him. As far back as 1835, when he was examined before a Committee of the House of Commons on the subject, he had suggested remedies for some of them, and, in common doubtless with many of their Lordships, he had hoped that the Bill of 1853 would have provided a remedy, if not for all, at least for a considerable part of them. It would be remembered, however, that during the progress of the Bill through a Committee of their Lordships' House some of the powers proposed to be conferred on the Commissioners were considerably curtailed, owing, perhaps, to some mistrust of a new and untried Board. But, although he had been disappointed in that hope, still much good had been done by the labours of the able Gentlemen who conducted the inquiry. Under the present system, a sum amounting to about a million and a half a year, was distributed among the poor from charitable endowments, and he thought it no exaggeration to say that a large portion of this sum was wasted, and worse than wasted, for it was applied in ways that were positively mischievous. A portion of the money was applied in paying the stipends of grammar schoolmasters who had very few pupils, and who wished to have none. Another portion was employed, or rather squandered, in the encouragement of profligacy and vice. The evils of the system were so great, and the advantages that would follow a reform so manifest, that one was sometimes inclined to wish that Parliament should at once pass a general measure to put an end at once and for ever to all the absurdities annexed to bequests by founders, who thought they could foresee the wants of the community throughout all time. There were several classes of foundation to which it was desirable the attention of the Legislature should be called. The first was that numerous class in which some portion of the income of the charities was directed to objects which were generally admitted to be good—such as schools or hospitals—but in which the larger portion was applied to objects of a more questionable character which overshadowed those that were beneficial. The next class was that in which the object of the charity was a good one at the time of the foundation, but had, owing to the altered state of local circumstances or to the changed state of society generally, become one which it was difficult or impossible to carry out, or which, at all events, was at variance with enlightened views of public policy. There was another class which was one in which the foundation itself was good—where no fault was to be found with the trust—but where the administration was bad. Much information on this subject was contained in the Report of the Education Commissioners, a document of which it was impossible to speak too highly. He did not mean to say that he concurred in all the recommendations of the Report, but, as a great and impartial account of the state of popular education at the time it was written, and as a document distinguished for liberal and enlightened views, it was impossible to over-estimate that Report. His opinion was that authority should be committed to some competent Board, such as the Charity Commissioners, or the Committee of Privy Council, who would direct and enforce a proper administration of the funds, or one more in harmony with public policy. It was wholly unnecessary for him to occupy their Lordships' time with cases illustrative of these abuses, for they were abundantly set forth in the Report of the Commissioners; but still he might be allowed to cite a few. There were educational charities in which the income was principally directed to be applied in the board and lodging of children. Such a direction involved the expense of erecting buildings and the heavy item of solicitors' costs. Thus he found that a sum of £1,600 was devoted to educating fifty boys at an expense of £32 a head, though the same class of education was given for 30s. a head in the National School near at hand. There were the cases in which no provision was made for removing ignorant, incapable or immoral masters. He need not dwell upon the necessity of a law which would get rid of such persons. To show the mischief attendant on indiscriminate charities, he might mention those charities which were called "bread charities," when an allowance of bread was given each Sunday to whoever of a particular class went to church; the clergyman used to say that he could tell by looking at the seats whose turn it was to get bread; but as the donation of bread was limited to only four Sundays in the month, when a month occurred in which there was a fifth Sunday the church was comparatively empty, for no bread was given that day. Then there were the provisions in the regulations framed by the donor of the charity, which scarcely corresponded with the spirit of the present day—that the master of an hospital, for instance, was to be in holy orders, and to wear the same dress and to take his food at the same table with the alms people. To prove the mischief attendant on the indiscriminate distribution of a large sum of money in small shares, he would only adduce the instance of the Manchester Charity, which dispensed every year £2,600, and so carelessly that one woman received three sums under three different names. Then, again, there was a London parish in which every year £200 was given away in shillings and one-and-sixpences, and the days on which the distribution was made the gin palaces in the neighbourhood hired additional waiters to sell the gin which was called for by the recipients of the money. In one case, where 40s. was annually doled out in sixpences, he suggested that more ought to be given, and received the reply that the churchwardens would be torn to pieces if the distribution became more liberal. The most objectionable class of charity, however, was that in which it was given for the poor generally, and no words were added to fetter the discretion of the trusts. The sums thus, he might say, wickedly misemployed, might surely be made applicable to better purposes, and this might be done without interfering with the bond fide intentions of the founders. Would it not be well to transfer to a competent Board, such as the Charity Commissioners or the Committee of the Privy Council, the general administration of these charities? He approved the suggestion of the Commission on Education, that the Board of Charity Commissioners should be incorporated with the Privy Council. But the mode of passing schemes which was recommended would not succeed; for if the Privy Council had to go to Parliament in every case, they would be defeated by local clamour and prejudice. The true course was to adopt the provisions of the Bill introduced in 1853 before it was altered by the Committee of this House. By that Bill the scheme, after being finally settled, and after full notice to the parties concerned, was to be laid on the table of the two Houses, and, if unopposed, within three months became ipso facto the law. If Parliament were unwilling to intrust to a Board like the Privy Council the power of preparing and originating schemes as provided for in that Bill, the mischief he had described would continue; and, in that case, he thought that the public would have a just right to complain of the Legislature for having reformed the University statutes, in which the rich were interested, and neglected to reform these endowments, in which the poor were chiefly concerned. He would now ask, whether the Government proposed to introduce any Measure for the purpose of carrying into effect the Recommendations of the Education Commissioners in reference to Charitable Endowments?

EARL GRANVILLE said, he agreed with a great part of the observations which had just been addressed to their Lordships, supported as they were by the practical experience of his noble Friend. He agreed also in the conclusion come to by the Education Commissioners that these endowments might be made more available than they now were for the furtherance of popular education, and that in many cases they might be diverted from useless or even injurious objects, and employed for educational purposes. He also entirely agreed with the noble Lord as to the beneficial effect which would have resulted from the passing of the Bill which was introduced in 1853. The result of the existing system had hitherto been, that when the Charity Commissioners took in hand some of the most obvious and easy improvements, they found that they had not the power to carry them out; they were then compelled to have recourse to the Court of Chancery, where in nine cases out of ten the fund was dissipated before a scheme could be framed. An Act, however, had passed at the close of last Session increasing the powers of the Commissioners, and transferring to them powers which before that time had been exercised by the Court of Chancery. A question had since arisen as to the construction of that Act; it was held to be doubtful whether charities as to which the Court of Chancery had already given orders came within the scope of the Bill, and thus several urgent cases had not yet been dealt with. There had not yet been sufficient time to test the working of this measure, but it appeared to be progressing satisfactorily. With regard to the recommendations contained in the Report of the Education Commissioners, the most important was that the functions of the Charity Commissioners should be transferred to the Educational Committee of the Privy Council; that this body should prepare schemes; that there should be an appeal from the local bodies to another Committee of the Privy Council; and that afterwards such schemes should be submitted to Parliament. With regard to administrative details, there was much to be said for and against the plan proposed; but he doubted very much whether Parliament would agree to the main principle of that plan, which would transfer to the Committee of Privy Council powers which would render them a quasi-judicial body—powers which hitherto had been exercised only by the Court of Chancery. He might also observe that the Charity Commissioners had now the advantage of the presence of the Vice President of the Council, who formed a sort of link between them and Parliament, and he doubted whether Parliament would approve of the transfer of the functions of a quasi-judicial Board to an executive and administrative department of the State like the Privy Council. Other suggestions which had been made, such as an easy method of registering endowments, were of much importance, and were under the consideration of the Government; but he did not think it advisable that the powers in question should be transferred entirely from the Charity Commissioners to the Department over which he had the honour to preside.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF POWIS wished to ask the noble Earl the President of the Council, If he had any objection to state what measures were likely to be introduced into that House before Easter, and thus to remove the ominous haze which surrounded the Speech from the Throne?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that he would in a few days state to their Lordships what measures of public business the Government proposed to bring forward in their Lordships' House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, February 9, 1863.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Reigate, Granville William Gresham Leveson Gower, esquire.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1st—Corrupt Practices at Elections [Bill 8]; Births and Deaths Registration (Ireland) [Bill 9].

INFECTION IN CABS.—QUESTION.

MR. BRADY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been directed to the evils resulting from persons labouring under infectious diseases being carried to hospitals in public conveyances; and, if so, if it is his intention to introduce any measure this Session with a view to remedy the same?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that no representations had been made to him by any public authorities upon this subject, but his attention had been directed to it by letters in the newspapers referring to it. The subject was one of importance, and there were great difficulties in the way of legislation. When the last Hackney Carriages Act was before Parliament the matter was discussed, and a clause was proposed having for its object the prevention of the evil to which the hon. Gentleman's question referred, but after a good deal of discussion it was withdrawn. There was no difficulty in enabling parochial authorities or hospitals to provide carriages for the transport of persons suffering from infectious diseases; the difficulty was as to empowering the drivers of hackney carriages to refuse fares on the ground that they believed that the persons about to enter their carriages were afflicted with such diseases.

MR. BRADY said, he wished to know whether, as the question was one of such great importance to the public, the right hon. Gentleman, in the event of his introducing a Bill to remedy the evil complained of, would have any objection to that course, and would he be ready to support it?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that on the contrary he should feel much obliged to the hon. Gentleman if he would embody his views upon the subject in the form of a Bill.

FIRE INSURANCE DUTY.—QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he rose to ask the hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. H. B. Sheridan), Whether he intends to bring in a Bill for the repeal of the Fire Insurance Duty this Session, and when?

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he could inform the hon. Member that he had already placed upon the Paper notice that it was his intention to ask for permission, on Tuesday, the 10th March, to bring in a Bill for the purpose of abolishing the fire insurance duty. The reason why he did not proceed with it last Session was, because it was thought expedient that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have twelve months to consider seriously the Resolution of the House.

DURHAM UNIVERSITY COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why the evidence taken by the Durham University Commissioners was not laid before Parliament on July 22, 1862, when the ordinances framed by the Commissioners, and dated June 30, were presented; whether he will forthwith lay a copy of such evidence before Parliament; and whether, as the Durham University Act, 1861, allows Parliament a period of forty days for the consideration of the ordinances before Her Majesty can be advised to declare her approval of the same, he will undertake that full and sufficient time shall be allowed to Parliament for the consideration of the evidence before Her Majesty shall be advised to signify her approval of the ordinances?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that it was required by the Act of Parliament that the ordinances framed by the Commissioners should be laid before Parliament, but it was not so as to the evidence. In the cases of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, the evidence was not laid before Parliament. The Government had no direct control over the proceedings of the Commissioners, some of whom were Members of that House, but he did not apprehend that the Commissioners would have the slightest objection to afford the information the right hon. Gentleman desired. They had in fact, as he was informed, sent the evidence last year to the authorities of the University. The ordinances were laid upon the table on the 22nd of July last, and therefore twenty-four of the forty days during which they must be before Parliament before confirmation were unexpired at the beginning of this Session. Petitions had been presented against the ordinances, which would be referred to a Committee of the Privy Council, and ample time would be given for the consideration of the objections raised by the Petitioners.

SERVICE OF BRITISH OFFICERS IN CHINA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he desired to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, as permission is given, by a notification in the Gazette of January 13th, to British Officers to accept Commissions in the service of the Emperor of China, similar permission extends to British Officers and British Subjects to accept Commissions in the service of the Taeping Emperor or his Government?

MR. LAYARD said, that in answer to the hon. and gallant Member he would beg leave to state that permission had not been given to British Officers to hold commissions in the service of the Taeping Emperor, with whom the Government had not the honour of being acquainted.

THE GALWAY POSTAL SUBSIDY. QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, of which he had given private notice—namely, Whether any intimation has been given to the Atlantic Steam Navigation Company that the subsidy formerly granted was about to be restored; and if so, whether that intimation has been coupled with the condition that a certain sliding scale of prices was to be attached varying according to the speed of the vessels employed?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: A communication has recently been made from the Treasury to the Galway Company, in accordance with previous intimations, to the effect that if the Admiralty shall report that the company are in a condition, as to vessels, to perform the duty which they propose to undertake, Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to recommend to this House the renewal of the contract, the details of the arrangements being reserved for settlement between the company and the Government. The Government have not attached to that communication the condition that there shall be a sliding scale of payments, depending upon the rapidity or slowness of the vessels.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICAN INTER-COLONIAL RAILROAD.—QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he also wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any engagements have been made by the Imperial Government to guarantee the interest on a sum of money to be raised for the construction of the Intercolonial Railroad; and if so, whether all papers connected with any such engagements will be laid before the House?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE stated, that his hon. Friend would find the greater part of the information which he desired in certain papers that were laid before Parliament in the course of the last Session upon the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for London. He would there find a despatch which was written by his noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Office, who declined to accede to a request from the British North American provinces for direct assistance by way of subsidy towards the construction of an intercolonial railroad. But in the course of last year the Government expressed their willingness, on certain terms, to lend the credit of the Imperial Government to the Provinces of British North America to assist them in raising a loan for carrying out that project. Since the last Session of Parliament there had been some further correspondence of no material consequence. A visit had also been made to England by certain Members of the Governments of Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, as delegates, to make arrangements with Her Majesty's Government on the subject. Those gentlemen had now returned to America in order to introduce into the Legislatures of the several colonies measures which should form a basis for the carrying out of the project. The further correspondence would, when completed, be laid upon the table in continuation of that which was produced last Session.

Sir George Grey

QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary for India, What progress has been made in the construction of the Pier and improvement of the Harbour of Sedashghur, and in the opening of the roads from the cotton districts thereto? The right hon. Baronet had recently, in the course of a public statement, referred, among other subjects, to the works going on in the harbour of Sedashghur, and had then entered into a statement of the number of persons employed and the progress that had been made. Since then he understood that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman had been directly and bluntly contradicted by a person professing to have accurate information. He therefore wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman, in consequence of that contradiction, was now prepared to modify or retract what he recently stated; and whether he would lay all the papers relating to the subject before the House?

MR. KENNARD said, that before the right hon. Gentleman answered the question, he wished to know whether he could now furnish the information respecting the Bengal army for which he had applied in 1861?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: With regard to the last Question addressed to me by the hon. Member, I am afraid I must ask him to repeat the Question on some other evening, as I cannot answer it without inquiry in my office. I am happy to have an opportunity of answering the inquiry made by the noble Lord. On the occasion to which he refers, I read an extract from a letter which I had received from Dr. Forbes, the superintendent of the factory at Darwah, giving an account of works in progress on which, as he understood, nearly 7,000 men were employed. I have no reason to believe that he was materially wrong in the statement which he then made; but I have received a public despatch on the subject since that time, and I think the best answer which I can give to the noble Lord's question will be to read an extract from that despatch. I am sorry to say that on one portion of the works a check has occurred in their progress, but this is due to one of those circumstances over which no control can be exercised, and which cannot be foreseen or prevented—namely, the influence of the climate upon the health of the men employed. Some of my hon. Friends, who are impatient for the acceleration of works in India, I hope will see, that although labour may be abundant in some parts of India, it is impossible at all times and all places to command it. Colonel Kennedy, Superintending Engineer of the Southern Circuit, writes, under date of the 30th of September—

“Belgaum, Dec. 20, 1862.

“I have just returned from an inspection of the Canara works. The Kyga Ghaut and its approaches, both above and below, to the head of the Kala-Nuddee navigation, are open to a minimum width of twelve feet, and are quite practicable for laden carts, though not yet prepared to receive a heavy traffic. Arrangements were made this year for prosecuting the works with great vigour, but those arrangements have been entirely frustrated by the unusually unhealthy state of the country through which the road passes. Fever has broken out with such virulence that the imported working parties have been broken up and dispersed, and the small amount of local labour is prostrated. Officers and subordinates have not escaped, and the executive engineer himself is so ill that he cannot remain in the district. Of 2,000 men lately employed on the works, within the space of a few days 900 were stricken with sickness. Several died, and the rest cleared off the work in 48 hours, carrying with them reports which deterred the advance of others who were on their way to the ghaut. Under these circumstances it is very difficult to say when the ghaut will be entirely completed; with this year's experience, which has, however, been unprecedentedly unfavourable, it will be very difficult again to collect workpeople; and, in fact, unless the malaria abates to a very material extent, it will be fruitless to do so, for men cannot and will not work when suffering from disease, nor will they consent to remain to die. The completion of the Kyga to the head of the navigation, though desirable, is not essential for the trade, provided the other road is available; and no preparations have yet been made by any persons to receive cotton at the termination of the former on the banks of the Kala-Nuddee. Too much stress has, I think, been laid on the Kyga Ghaut approach, owing, I believe, to the discussion about it having arisen before the alternative line was suggested and settled on. The question has not yet been cleared of the consideration that it first involved—namely, that the Kyga was the only approach to Sedashghur. It cannot matter to the houses concerned by what route they get their goods to the place where they require them, provided the one actually available possesses no marked disadvantages in respect to any other; and this is clearly the case as regards the Arbyle and Kyga lines. I believe amongst those who have any local knowledge of the circumstances there is no difference of opinion in the matter. The Arbyle and Ankola line is already opened out to full width to within fourteen miles of Beitkul, and a considerable portion of it is well provided with surface and drainage works. Of the incomplete fourteen miles nine are cut to twelve feet minimum width, and five on level ground have just been commenced. In addition to this there is a branch road on a less convenient line over a high range of hills, which is opened the whole way to a minimum width of twelve feet, and by which cart communication with Beitkul is now opened throughout. On the Arbyle approach we have a heavy force engaged (two companies of Sappers and Miners, 500 convicts, and 2,500 labourers), which will, I trust, now increase day by day; and I think there is every prospect that the road will be ready to the full width by March or April next. On the transfer of North Canara to Bombay, on the 1st of February, 1862, it was determined to abandon for the present at least the idea of wharves in the situation selected by Sir William Denison, and in place of them to construct at once a quay or landing-place on the eastern shore of Beitkul Cove. A plan and estimate for a screw pile pier were called for. A commencement was made during my late visit with the wharf wall. Before I left Sedashegur it had begun to show above low-water mark; and by March next, before it is wanted, I expect that a length of at least 300 feet will be ready for landing and shipping goods. This wharf is being laid in three to four feet water at low tide, and will be accessible to cargo boats except at low water. It was originally intended to erect a pier on the western side of the Cove, but it has now been determined by the common consent of the representatives of the mercantile houses and the Government officers to place the pier on the eastern side. However, though it is most desirable to have a pier, one is not immediately and absolutely essential; for, when the wharf wall now in progress is ready, goods can be landed and shipped in cargo boats without difficulty. When the following works are completed, the absolutely essential and immediate requirements of the port will have been supplied:—The Arbyle Ghaut approach; the road from Beitkul to Konay; the wharf wall. It is confidently hoped that they will be finished to a sufficient extent to render them effectual by March or April next. Every possible effort is being made to secure this. The following works, not absolutely essential, but highly desirable, will be completed with as little delay as is practicable, under the peculiar circumstances of the districts:—The Kyga Ghaut line; the pier; the lighthouse. When all these works have been finished, sufficient will probably have been done until the port develops itself more fully, and it is ascertained what steps are necessary for improving or preserving the harbour, or to meet the increased requirements of the trade."

Such is the official statement made upon the matter. It appears that the works as proposed were being carried out with much vigour, but in consequence of the fever suddenly breaking out in the district the progress of the works was interrupted in the manner stated. I have not the least objection to lay on the table the whole correspondence which has taken place with the Governments of Madras and Bombay on the subject; and if the noble Lord will move for the papers on an early day, they shall be granted as an unopposed Return.

Sir Charles Wood

SUPPLY.

THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS' SPEECH considered, and a Motion being made "That a Supply be granted to Her Majesty,"

MR. PEEL moved to resolve that this House will, to-morrow, resolve itself into a Committee to consider that Motion.

POLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to put to the noble Lord at the head of the Government a Question which he put to him during the Debate on the Address, but which was not then answered. Upon that occasion he called attention to the state of Poland, and to the treaty obligations into which England had entered with respect to that country. He had also asked the noble Lord whether it was the fact that during the Crimean war certain overtures were made by Austria to the allies with reference to Poland, to the effect that the latter country should be restored to independence, and whether the noble Lord would allow the papers on that subject to be laid before the House. He had asked those questions in two preceding Sessions, but had received no answer, and he then repeated them for the fourth time since he had been in the House. It was of the utmost importance at that juncture that the facts should be accurately known. Poland was in a state of insurrection. The people of that country had been driven to revolt by outrages unparalleled in these times. It was surely, then, their duty to ascertain whether, on more than one occasion, England had the opportunity of helping Poland and had neglected that opportunity. In 1831 Austria and France took a lively interest on behalf of Poland, and France, urged by Austria, then represented to the English Government the desirableness of assisting Poland, but the noble Viscount refused to interfere. He would remind the House that despatches concealed from Parliament for the last thirty years had only recently been published. So strongly did he (Mr. Hennessy) feel on the subject, that he would take the liberty of submitting on an early day an Address to the Queen upon it, and in order that the noble Viscount might be in possession of the scope of that Address he would take the liberty of stating that it humbly represented to Her Majesty that certain treaty obligations had been incurred by England and other Powers with reference to Poland, and that those treaty obligations had not been fulfilled by Russia; that those treaty obligations were set forth in the first fourteen articles of the Treaty of Vienna; that the Emperor of Russia in 1815 undertook, amongst other engagements, to restrict the public appointments in Poland to Poles; that for many years past not one of those engagements had been fulfilled; that a breach of the solemn engagements thus incurred between England and Russia had recently been described by Her Majesty's First Minister in these words—

"The course which the Government of Russia has adopted towards Poland is a complete and decided violation of the Treaty of Vienna. The stipulations of that treaty were broken almost as soon as concluded. Perhaps the greatest violation of a treaty that has ever taken place in the history of the world was that which occurred in the case of Poland."

The Address then proceeded to state that for some years past the people of Poland had borne with exemplary patience that deliberate violation of their national rights; that while their pacific endurance had attracted the admiration of Europe, it seemed to have roused the worst passions of the Russian Government; that, owing to an accumulation of outrages and cruelty unparalleled in these times, the kingdom of Poland was now the scene of a devastating conflict between the troops of Russia and the people who had been driven to desperation. The Address then humbly submitted to her Majesty that these facts urgently demanded the interposition of England in vindication of her own public faith and solemn engagements, and that steps should at once be taken to enforce the treaty obligations which this country had incurred in respect of Poland.

MR. SPEAKER: Perhaps I should at an earlier stage have pointed out that the course which is now being pursued by the hon. Member is contrary to the established practice of this House. The Motion is not that the House do now, but that it will tomorrow, resolve itself into Committee of Supply. It has been ruled in this House, and I am bound to adhere to that rule, that the proper occasion for any hon. Member to avail himself of the opportunity of introducing topics on the Motion for Committee of Supply is when the Motion is that the House do resolve itself into Committee of Supply, and not when, as at present, the question is, that the Committee be appointed for a future day.

VOL. CLXIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

GREECE.—QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government has made any diplomatic proposal to the Greek people of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg to fill the vacancy of the Throne of Greece; and, if so, whether the Duke has signified his willingness, under any circumstances, to become a candidate?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The Greek question at present stands thus:—The Greek nation fixed upon the election of Prince Alfred, son of Her Majesty, and it was only yesterday that the Greek Minister communicated that decision to my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office. To that, of course, the answer given was in conformity with the announcement in the Speech; but no other candidate has yet been proposed to the Greek nation in any formal manner. The Duke of Coburg has been sounded privately on the subject for the purpose of ascertaining whether, in the event of being proposed or elected by the Greek people, he would accept the throne, and the Duke of Coburg has declined to be put in nomination for the Throne of Greece.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend and continue the Law relating to Corrupt Practices at Elections. The Bill he proposed to introduce was in substance, though not in form, similar to a measure which had already been twice before the House. While the Bill proposed to continue much of the existing law, it would at the same time embody certain recommendations of the Select Committee which had inquired into the subject. In a former Act of Parliament there was a provision that paid agents should not be allowed to vote at elections. That provision was not contained in the existing law. But evidence had been brought before the Committee to show that a number of persons who were electors were usually employed as messengers, and were paid at a rate which amounted to a remuneration for their votes. It was therefore proposed, not in the precise terms, but in substance, to re-enact that provision of the 7 & 8 Geo. IV. which prevented those persons from voting at any election, or struck off their votes if they had been taken. The next part of the Bill would involve the repeal of the existing clauses with respect to election auditors, which appeared to the Committee to be ineffectual for their purpose, while they caused some expense to candidates. It was proposed to substitute for those clauses provisions that all expenses of candidates, except their own personal expenses, should be paid through agents to be selected by themselves, their names being published by the returning officer before the nomination. No demand would be permitted to be enforced after a limited time subsequent to the election, and all bills would have to be paid within a month after the election. In three months from the settlement of the accounts the agent would be required, under penalties, to make to the returning officer a correct statement of all the expenses, which would be published, and every voter would have an opportunity of investigating the accounts. The next provision would extend to Election Committees the power possessed by a Commission of Inquiry to compel witnesses to give evidence, subject to an indemnity to be given to them, which would in some cases enable a Committee to elicit the facts without a subsequent Commission. There was another provision, which, when extensive bribery or corruption was reported by a Commission, would give the sanction of Parliament to a Resolution of the House of Commons to suspend for a period of five years the power of returning Members to that House. There were some provisions as to indictments and proceedings of Committees which he need not now specify. He had stated the principal provisions of the Bill, which he begged now to be permitted to introduce.

MR. HUNT said, he wished to call attention to the fact that under the present state of the law the accounts of the election auditor might be kept back until after the petition against a return had been presented. That was a great blot on the law. It would be highly proper that the accounts should be published by such a time as the election inquiry might take place, so that the Committee might be able to go thoroughly into the accounts. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not announced it his intention to go into the whole question of election petitions. Last Session petitions had been presented merely for the purpose of causing other petitions to be withdrawn. He thought that every discouragement should be given to presenting petitions upon frivolous grounds, and that none should be presented without having its grounds thoroughly sifted. It seemed to be thought by many that an election petition was a sort of private affair between the respective candidates, but such an opinion should not be allowed to prevail. He thought that no petition should be withdrawn until the reasons for the withdrawal had been sifted by the Committee; and that if the defeated candidate could show that corruption had existed, it was for the House to take up the prosecution, and not for the disappointed candidate. The charges made on the candidates by the sheriffs of counties and the returning officers in boroughs at present varied very much, and he thought those charge sought to be defined and scheduled.

MR. CHILDERS said, he approved of the Bill, as he thought the recommendations of the Select Committee were deserving of being incorporated into the Act. Still they only touched the fringe of the evil. In three cases out of four bribery took place in the afternoon. He by no means meant to say that bribery was never committed early in the day, and when candidates were in a large majority; but the time when it was generally committed was between two and three o'clock, when there was a very close run in the voting, and five or ten votes on either side might determine the election. The cause, in his opinion, was the publication of the half-hour states of the poll, and if any mode could be devised by which such publication could be prevented, one very great encouragement to bribery would be done away. In that matter they might take a leaf out of the Reform Bill proposed by the Earl of Derby's Government, which admitted the principle of rendering the state of the poll uncertain; for it allowed the votes of persons who lived at a distance to be recorded by means of voting papers, the result of which could not be ascertained until later. He would propose that votes should be taken by means of voting papers filled up in the polling booth, but published after the declaration of the poll. Such a plan would not be open to the objections which some hon. Members had to the practice of secret voting, and at the same time it would have all the effect of secret voting in preventing bribery, as under such an arrangement the agents would not have sufficient knowledge of the state of the poll to induce a resort to afternoon bribery. That would do more to put an end to bribery than the additions to the present law proposed by the present Bill.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he was of opinion, that if the publication of the state of the poll was to be suppressed, the voting must be carried on entirely by means of papers. If an endeavour were made to conceal the votes of the electors as they went to the poll, the course of proceeding would be, that agents would be stationed near each polling-booth to ask the voters as they returned from recording their votes how they had voted, and Englishmen, not being afraid that their conduct should be known, would generally answer the queries, and the state of the poll would in that way be known. If they adopted the system of voting by papers or registered letters, the hour by hour publication of the poll would be impossible. He assumed that bribery generally took place within the last hour of the polling, but he did not think that the difficult question how it was to be put down would find a solution, except through the instrumentality of voting papers.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he was of opinion that voting papers would facilitate rather than deter from the commission of bribery.

MR. HADFIELD said, that all the proposals made by hon. Members were only applicable to small constituencies. He preresented a large constituency, and he did not believe that any one in it was suspected of bribery. It was only in small constituencies that the electors were open to undue influences. He thought this was a powerful argument in favour of the redistribution of seats, and of divesting small burghs of their representatives and of giving them to the large towns, which were free from any such suspicion.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he was in favour of giving the seat vacated through bribery to the innocent candidate, however small might be the number of his supporters, and however large that of the peccant and unseated member. Such a course would be a real security against bribery, as it would render all the previous preparations of the buying candidate of no avail. If it were suggested that it would be unfair to the constituents, he submitted that it would be a very proper penalty for permitting themselves to be bribed.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend and continue the Law relating to Corrupt Practices at Elections, ordered to be brought in by Sir GEORGE GREY and Mr. BRUCE.

MILITIA ESTIMATES.—RESOLUTIONS.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that as the Resolution of which he had given notice might be considered to involve a change in the constitutional practice in regard to moving the Estimates for the Disembodied Militia, a few words of explanation as to the origin of the practice might be necessary. The Militia Estimates had become a matter of routine and usually passed with little general observation, but there was a time when the militia was connected with the most stimulating Parliamentary contests. It was the assumption of the management of the militia by the Long Parliament that caused the civil war between Charles I. and his subjects. After the Restoration an Act of Parliament was passed which vested the government of the militia in the Crown, and therefore that constitutional question was set at rest. At the same time the charge of the militia was imposed upon persons of property in the counties, under the control of the lords-tenant and deputy-tenants. The expense of the militia was, in fact, defrayed out of the county rate, and became a matter not only of local management but of local charge. About the end of the reign of George II., in 1757, an Act was passed by which, while the management of the militia was substantially left unchanged, the expense was transferred to the general taxation of the country, and became the subject of votes of the House of Commons. The Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, under that Act, on the certificate of the lords-tenant of counties, made an order for the amount required upon the Receiver of Land Tax. By that change the militia became, as far as payment was concerned, virtually upon the same footing as the King's army—the regular army of the country; but the Militia Estimates were not, concurrently with that change, prepared in the same mode as the regular Army Estimates. He presumed, from a desire to retain on the part of the popular branch of the Legislature, some portion of that hold on the militia which had existed when the militia was a purely local charge, the preparation of the Militia Estimates was placed under the control of that House, and annually a Motion was made for the appointment of a Select Committee to prepare them. That system was introduced soon after the passing of the Act of 1757, and had continued, he believed without any alteration, up to the present day. When that peculiar mode of preparing the Militia Estimates was introduced, the Estimates were substantially prepared by the Select Committees of that House; but at what period the change, which afterwards took place, occurred, he was unable to say. However, since he had been a Member of that House, and he apprehended from a date much earlier, it had been the practice for the executive Government to prepare the Militia Estimates, and they were submitted, ready prepared, to the Select Committee. That Committee generally assented to them with little or no investigation. The appointment of the Committee, in fact, had become little better than a matter of form, for substantially the Committee no longer exercised any power. During the last Session, indeed, the appointment of the Committee gave rise to misunderstanding, and some hon. Members of that House thought that the Government [were taking an unusual course in referring the matter to a Select Committee, and a discussion thereon arose. He had, consequently, stated, in the course of last Session, that if the change was likely to meet with the general approbation of the House, he should propose that the Militia Estimates should be put on the same footing as the other Army Estimates, and that the whole should be presented simultaneously to the House by the Government. He would state what was the practice with respect to other branches of expense similar to the militia. The Estimate for the Yeomanry was included in the ordinary Army Estimates. The same was the case with respect to the Volunteers. The Estimate for the embodied militia was likewise included in the Army Estimates. The distinction was between the embodied and disembodied militia, and the Resolution he proposed referred exclusively to the disembodied militia. The annual Vote for the Jersey and Guernsey militia was also included in the general Army Estimates. For the purpose of the Appropriation Act the Vote for the militia was likewise comprehended under the same category as the general vote for the army, and the sum was included in the Army Accounts. If any valid objection could be urged to the Resolution he now proposed, he should have no desire to press his Motion on the House. He believed, however, that in reference to the mode of presenting the expense of the armed force of the country, it would be found more convenient than the existing mode, that the whole of the charges should be under the consideration of Parliament simultaneously. At present, the charge for the disembodied militia, which last year amounted to £750,000, was presented apart from the other Military Estimates, and was considered at the end of the Session—an arrangement less convenient for discussion, and involving, as it seemed to him, less responsibility to the executive Government, than if it were included in the general Estimates for the army. He, therefore, hoped that the House would agree to the first Resolution he had to propose. He had placed two Resolutions on the notice paper, in order that the House might understand the course of proceeding he intended to take; but that night he should only move the first Resolution, postponing until after the report of the first the second Resolution for an Address to the Crown, praying that Estimates of the charge for the disembodied militia might be prepared and laid before the House. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving a Resolution—

“That in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to discontinue the practice of appointing a Select Committee to prepare Estimates of the charge of the Disembodied Militia of Great Britain and Ireland; and that such Estimates be in future prepared on the responsibility of Ministers of the Crown.”

COLONEL DUNNE said, that the objection to the Resolution was, that it transferred to the Crown the old constitutional power possessed by that House, and converted the militia into a part of the Standing Army. A militia force was adopted at an early period of our history, on the abolition of the old feudal system of knights' fees, established by William the Conqueror. As early as the time of Henry VIII., if not earlier, our kings issued warrants to lords-lieutenant, as they named them, and sent them to different counties, where they raised troops; and that practice continued down to the time of Charles I., and in accordance with this practice he issued such warrants to certain noblemen, whom he constituted lords-lieutenant, and assumed to himself the power of raising the militia force, which was opposed by the Long Parliament and wrested from him. After the Restoration, in the 13th, 14th, and 15th years of Charles II., Acts of Parliament reinvested the management of the militia in the Crown, but the cost was defrayed by the counties out of the county rates. That system continued till the 42nd of George II., when the cost was transferred to the Consolidated Fund, but the House retained the power of preparing the Estimate. The Estimate was not made at the pleasure of the Crown; it did not depend on any regulation of the Minister of War. Practically the Estimates had been prepared by the Government officials, and laid before the Select Committee, and it would appear to have been for some time so far a formality, because the Committee rarely exercised the power it possessed of revising the Estimate presented, though that power enabled it not only to diminish, but increase the amount if it thought fit. But within the last ten years he had known those Estimates discussed and divisions take place in Committee on the details. He believed that such discussions were not convenient to the Crown; and this, he supposed, was the reason for getting rid of them. But by agreeing to these Resolutions the House would be giving up a constitutional principle. He could see no inconvenience in the Committee; and if the Committee did their duties, they could make alterations in the Estimates and submit them to the House, which could not be done in other military Estimates. However, he did not now mean to offer any serious objection to the Resolution; but he thought the House had had very short notice of so important a change on a constitutional question as that contemplated, and he trusted, that if the House were disposed to pass the Resolution that night, the right hon. Baronet would give them time for its full consideration.

COLONEL GILPIN said, that though it was true the Militia Estimates were prepared by the War Minister, yet for a long series of years it had been the custom of the House to take the initiative on those Estimates, and in the Select Committee opportunity was afforded for their consideration and, if necessary, for their alteration. If once the Militia Estimates were assimilated to the other Army Estimates, he should like to know what chance there would be of effecting any alteration in them. But whether the new system was adopted or the old continued, he only hoped that care would be taken to obtain value for the money expended.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that there was no intention on the part of the Government, or on his own part, to make the smallest alteration in the system of managing the militia, nor to propose any alteration in the existing Acts by which they were governed. No change would be made, except in the mode of bringing the Estimates under the consideration of the House. He believed that the mode he proposed would be found most convenient and acceptable to a majority of Members, and there was no other reason for maintaining the present system than its antiquity and its existence. Under the proposed system the Estimates must come before the House in Committee of Supply, and any alteration could then be made.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that his experience did not lead him to pay much respect to Estimates, and the evidence taken by the Committee on Public Accounts clearly showed that Estimates were scarcely any guide to expenditure. He did not see the value of the change proposed. Practically the Militia Estimates were prepared by the Government, and were allowed by the House; but in the Committee Gentlemen holding high rank could express their opinions with much more ease and familiarity than they could in the House; and he did not see the advantage of giving up any possible check upon the Government which the sitting of the Committee afforded. The House would always look with jealousy upon financial power as affecting the militia. There was another question which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman had considered, and that was the omission of the details of militia expenditure from the published accounts. The House was aware that the expenditure of the army was published in detail after it had been incurred; and although it was true they did not get the accounts until some time after the expenditure, still the detailed account was the only document which showed how vast millions were expended. But in the Militia Accounts No. 4 was a blank page. If it were not intended to make an alteration, he would bring the matter under the consideration of the House. As matters stood the large sums voted for the militia were practically not explained in the usual form. The matter was noticed by the Committee on Public Accounts in one of their Reports, and the defect he complained of ought to be corrected by the Government giving the militia expenditure in detail in the same manner as the army expenditure was given.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the present practice was to present a detailed account in respect of the embodied militia, and it was included in the annual army account; but in respect of the disembodied militia the expense was given annually in a total sum, but without details. All the money, however, was spent under the administration of the War Office, and ample materials existed there for a detailed account. He should be happy to give the details to any extent that might be desired by the House.

GENERAL PEEL said, he considered that it would be of great advantage to have the Militia Estimates submitted to the House along with the Army Estimates, so that hon. Members could see at one glance what was to be the whole military expenditure for the year. If that were the object of the right hon. Gentleman's Resolution, he would be willing to accept it. Hitherto they had only learned incidentally what were the expenses of the disembodied militia when the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his annual statement. If, however, there were any advantage in having the Estimates submitted to a Committee, there was no reason why that advantage should not be continued, as it might be if the Committee were to sit at an earlier period of the Session.

COLONEL DICKSON said, that after what had been said by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby) and by the right hon. Gentleman below him (General Peel), and after the almost vain attempts made to reduce the expenditure last year, a little time ought to be allowed to them to consider what effect the right hon. Baronet's Resolution would probably have. They had had short notice of the Resolution.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I gave notice of it on the first night of the Session.

COLONEL DICKSON said, that the notice was certainly short, and hon. Members might not have paid attention to it on the first night of the Session. He hoped they might have time to consider the matter before the Resolution was pressed, especially as some officers had said, that if the House were divided, they would vote against the Motion.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he could not have given longer notice unless

he had brought the matter forward last Session; and if he postponed it, it would be for another year, inasmuch as it would be impossible to frame the current Estimates upon a Resolution so postponed.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved,

That in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to discontinue the practice of appointing a Select Committee to prepare Estimates of the charge of the Disembodied Militia of Great Britain and Ireland; and that such Estimates be in future prepared on the responsibility of Ministers of the Crown.

BIRTHS, &c. REGISTRATION (IRELAND).

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for the Registration of Births and Deaths in Ireland, said, Sir, although there can be no question of the value and importance of a national system of registration, there is such a variety of interests involved in this question that I feel it is desirable I should make a few remarks. It is undoubtedly a great deficiency that in a country like Ireland, having a population amounting to nearly six millions, there should be no systematic collection of the statistics of human life. As a scientific record, a system of registration would be of immense utility in many respects. It would be very beneficial, for instance, in promoting sanitary reforms. In Ireland there is at present a great want of information as to any increase of sickness or disease, especially in populous towns or in remote country places. If correct data could be obtained as to the health of the people, measures would be more promptly and effectually taken to mitigate the intensity of disease or circumscribe its limits. This is a subject which has excited considerable interest in Ireland. In December last a resolution declaring the necessity for and the probable benefits of a system of registration was carried on the motion of the President of the Royal College of Physicians of Ireland at a meeting in Limerick. I have also had the honour of receiving deputations who urged the importance of legislation on the matter. I received deputations from the Royal College of Surgeons, the Royal Medical Council, the Statistical Society, and the Social Science Association. I asked them to put their views in writing, in order that the Government, in framing a Bill, might meet their wishes as far as possible. They complied with my request, and in the document which they forwarded to me they expressed the hope that the dispensary districts would be adopted, and the registration of births and deaths be made compulsory. It is not necessary to say that the measure which I am now seeking to introduce is not in any way affected by political considerations. All classes will be benefited by its adoption in Ireland, not as a mere registration of births and deaths, but as a plan for bringing annually before the public, as in England and Scotland, the causes affecting the health of the community. Ireland is almost the only civilized country in the world where no such system of civil registration of births and deaths exists. We frequently hear of great losses incurred by poor persons from their inability to prove their heirship or connection with rich parties dying intestate in the colonies or in foreign countries. It is, therefore, a matter of the first importance that we should pass a measure for obviating those difficulties. The English Act was passed in 1836. It caused a good deal of agitation at the time; but it has worked admirably. The passing of the Scotch Act was even more strongly opposed, and it was not until 1854, after an agitation of twenty years, that the opposition was overcome. The Scotch Act is an improvement upon the English one. I have carefully compared, in conjunction with Registrar General Donnelly and Registrar General Dundas, the Scotch and English systems, and there can be no doubt that the Scotch system is far superior to the one in force in England. Allow me to mention the differences which exist between the two Acts. In a Report published by Registrar General Graham it is stated that the English system should be compulsory instead of permissive; that the number of informants qualified to sign the register is too limited; that more time should be allowed for registration; and that medical men should be compelled to state the cause of death. All these points, in which, according to Mr. Graham, the English system is defective, have been included in the Scotch Act. The Scotch system of registration is compulsory; the number of informants qualified to sign the register is greater than in England; informants are compelled to attend personally and state the particulars to be recorded; the time for gratuitous registration of births is three months instead of forty-two days, as in England; and medical practitioners are required to send in a written certificate of the cause of death. When preparing the Bill which I am about to introduce, it became my duty to consider whether I should not embrace in it those provisions of the Scotch Act which were not to be found in the English one, which, nevertheless, have worked well in Scotland, and which Registrar General Graham thinks ought now to be adopted in England. To show the superiority of the Scotch system, I may mention that it has been ascertained, upon a six years' average of the registration of births, that the average gives in Scotland a proportion of 347 in every 10,000 of the population per annum, being rather a higher average than that of England, which is only 343 in every 10,000 of the population. I need not say that the principal points to be considered in the construction of such a Bill are the machinery, the size of the districts, and the expense to be entailed. I have thought, that if upon those three points I could meet the views of Irish Members generally, I might be able to pass a Bill during the present Session. Last year I proposed a plan which had been originally submitted by the noble Lord the Member for Cockermonth (Lord Naas). Its object was to make the constabulary the registrars and superintendent registrars. If that plan had been adopted, the districts would have coincided with the areas in which the constabulary act. I think, however, the noble Lord the Member for Cockermonth will agree with me that, whatever might be the plan adopted, the general feeling in this House was not in favour of using the constabulary for that purpose. I have considered the matter carefully during the recess, and my firm conviction now is that it would be impossible, with the concurrence of this House or of the country, to work a system of registration by the action of the constabulary. The constabulary are fully occupied with the duties which they now perform, and which, I am bound to say they discharge most efficiently; and I think it would be injudicious to burden them with the work which would devolve upon them as registrars and superintendent registrars. In the Bill which I have now the honour to propose, therefore, I have adopted a system in conformity with that in operation in England—that is to say, I have adopted what I may call the Poor Law system, so that the areas or districts will be the areas of the unions, the dispensing medical officers of the unions will be the registrars, and the clerks of the unions will be the superintendent registrars. I believe that is the scheme which, on the whole, will meet with the greatest amount of support from the Irish Members, and I believe it is the scheme which is likely to work best for the social and sanitary improvement of the people of Ireland. The Poor Law districts are well known, whereas considerable inconvenience would have resulted in that respect from the employment of the constabulary. We have, therefore, followed the Poor Law system, and I think the districts will be found very suitable for the purposes of the registration. In Scotland there is a great disparity between the extent of the areas. I am informed by Registrar General Dundas, from whom I have received valuable assistance in this matter, that in Scotland, while some of the registration districts contain 30,000, 40,000 and even 50,000 inhabitants, others contain not more than 400 or 500. There are 1,000 districts altogether in that country, but the great variation in their extent, coupled with the compulsory principle of registration, works rather prejudicially for the interests of the poor. The area of Scotland and Ireland as hon. Members know, is very nearly the same; but in Ireland we propose to have the system much better arranged. The districts will be very much of one size, the average population of each being 7,400. Besides 163 unions we have 718 dispensary districts with 777 dispensary medical officers—thus forming an admirable machinery ready to our hand. These dispensary medical officers are superior to the village doctors in England; many of them have professional connections extending over large tracts of country, and I believe they will be able to furnish most valuable returns. We next come to the question of expense. The deputations I had the honour to receive at Dublin from the College of Surgeons, the Statistical Society, and the Social Science Association, all recommended that the remuneration of the registrars should be defrayed from the local rates, but that the superintendent registrars should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. I gave the best attention I could to these suggestions, and the proposal I have now to make is, that the registrars should be paid, as in England, out of the rates, but that the superintendent registrars should receive their fees out of the Consolidated Fund. Considering the advantage that will be derived by all classes from this measure, the total burden that will be thrown upon the public will be comparatively very trifling—namely, £16,000 a year, or just upon five-sixteenths of a penny in the pound on the whole rateable valuation of Ireland. We propose, then, to pay the registrars 1s. for each entry, and the superintendent registrars 2d. The stationery and boxes will be supplied by the Government as in England and Scotland. There will be no other outlay attending the scheme except the salary of the Registrar General, which we propose to increase to £1,000 a year, in consideration of the additional duties to be devolved upon him. This subject has already been before Parliament two or three times. The Registrar General of England formerly received £1,000 a year, and now receives £1,200; but it must be recollected that he has charge of three times the population of Ireland, and has three times the amount of registration to attend to. In Ireland 130 union-houses out of the whole number, namely 163, are built upon a uniform plan, and consequently the office of the clerk of the union, who will be the superintendent registrar, will be very convenient for this purpose. Moreover, the union houses are generally in a central situation, and thus every facility will be afforded for the registration. After the most careful consideration of the subject, I think that no better plan than this can be devised. It brings us in Ireland into harmony with the system pursued in England, and also, to a great extent, into conformity with the system adopted in Scotland. We require by this Bill the compulsory attendance of the parties. This is absolutely necessary; and Registrar General Graham says the want of it is one of the chief blots in the English system. The only other point on which I need trespass on the time of the House is a very important one, namely, the medical certificates. We wish to make our scheme as complete as possible, in order to obtain not a mere registration of births and deaths, but a scientific record of vital statistics, and with that view we have introduced into our Bill a provision which we think will meet the approval of the medical officers. We have not desired, as is done in Scotland, to make it binding on them penally to give the return. From the opportunities I have had of conversing with the President of the Royal College of Surgeons, and judging also from other sources of information, I believe that the medical officers generally will be prepared to co-operate with the State, and to furnish it with the requisite particulars as to the deaths of persons whom they may have attended professionally with greater readiness if it is left to them to do it freely, instead of its being made compulsory on them by the insertion of a penal clause. I have nothing further to add, except that I shall be glad to reply, as far as I am able, to any remarks which hon. Gentlemen may offer on the measure, a brief outline of the main features and provisions of which I have now given. The Bill has been conceived in a most liberal and impartial spirit, with a desire as much as possible to conciliate all classes of the community; and as I feel quite certain that by its adoption a great work of national improvement will be promoted, I hope that it will not only receive the favourable consideration of this House, but that the present Session will not close without seeing it passed into law. I beg, therefore, now to move for leave to bring in the Bill.

LORD NAAS said, he was glad that his right hon. Friend had thus early in the Session called the attention of the House to that important subject. It was really a disgrace to the country that any portion of the United Kingdom should be left for so many years without an efficient system of registration of births, deaths, and he would add, of marriages. With the exception of Turkey, he believed his hon. Friend was justified in saying that Ireland was the only country in Europe without such a system. At the same time, he could not congratulate his right hon. Friend upon the result of the experience he had gained during the recess, as to the means by which he proposed to supply the desideratum. He was afraid that his hon. Friend had got into the hands of the doctors, and his opinion was that there were few men who were much better for that. Of all the methods which had been proposed for obtaining these very important statistics that which called in the aid of the doctors was perhaps the worst. [MR. BRADY: Oh!] His hon. Friend had a professional sympathy, but he (Lord Naas) had none, and therefore he repeated that they were about the very worst machinery that could be used. It appeared by his right hon. Friend's Bill that it was proposed to limit the choice of boards of guardians to the dispensary doctors, who were to have a primâ facie right to these appointments, wholly irrespective of their qualifications, their leisure, place of residence, or any other consideration. That, to his mind, was a very grave objection to the Bill. Now, that was not the case in England; for although it was perfectly true that in England a great number of medical men held the appointments, yet the choice of the appointing bodies was not limited, and, in point of fact, it was found that some of the most efficient registrars in this country were not medical men, nor in any way connected with the medical profession. Then, again, many of the medical men in Ireland were in very large practice, and their time very valuable. By the Bill they made the registration of the birth or death compulsory upon the person, who would have to go many miles to give the information to the registrar, and in nine cases out of ten the person would find the registrar away from home. That was an inevitable result, and therefore it was that he contended that the doctor in Ireland, from his high position, his large practice, and the demands upon his time, was of all others the most unsuitable man for the post. The duties were such that they could be performed quite as well by a clerk as by the highest surgeon, and therefore he thought the imposing of them upon medical men was a great mistake. Then, with regard to the size of the dispensary districts. The size of them was very great indeed; and if they made the registration compulsory, they would find great inconvenience and hardship the consequence, causing people to travel, perhaps fifteen or twenty miles, to register the birth or death of a particular member of their family. Such were a few of the objections he had to urge against the Bill. He thought it would be much better to leave it to the discretion of boards of guardians to appoint such parties as they might think fit. There was one important omission in the Bill, which he much regretted. It made no provision for the accurate registration of marriages, a matter so materially bound up with the question of property. Indeed, with regard to that subject, the register of the marriage was of primary importance, as determining the right of succession, legitimacy, and other questions upon which the possession of property turned. An admirable scheme of marriage registration had been laid before the Committee, which there was every reason to believe would receive the assent of a large majority of the community. He knew the question was a very delicate one; but it was perfectly possible to avoid the main difficulty by showing that the registration was in no way connected with the law of marriage. He still hoped his right hon. Friend would be induced to devote his attention to this part of the question. There was ample information at his disposal, as all the leaders of the different political and religious parties in Ireland had publicly expressed their opinions on the question, and his right hon. Friend had nothing to do but to take those opinions and adopt the best plan recommended by them. He did not mean to offer any serious opposition to this measure, but he reserved to himself the power, if he should think fit, not only to offer amendments as regarded the registration of births and deaths, but also to extend its provisions to the registration of marriages in Ireland.

MR. BRADY said, it was a disgrace to the nineteenth century that any portion of the kingdom should be without a proper registration of births, deaths, and marriages. He regarded an efficient system of registration of births and deaths as most important, not only in a statistical and social, but also in a moral point of view. But to make it effective there must be a proper staff; and, apart from his professional predilections, he maintained that medical men were of all classes the best qualified to act as registrars. In England butchers and bakers were appointed registrars, who, in copying the cause of death from the medical certificate, were often totally at a loss, being ignorant of the professional meaning of the terms employed. It was true, no doubt, that dispensary doctors in Ireland were in full employment, but there was on that very account no difficulty in handing to them the particulars for registration, as they were almost always engaged in the houses where either deaths or births took place. He saw no necessity, however, for the appointment of superintendent registrars, as the medical men who were to act as registrars were better educated and a superior class of men in many respects to the clerks of the unions whom it was proposed to place over them. He therefore would suggest that that provision of the Bill should be withdrawn. Upon the whole, however, he thanked the right hon. Baronet for having introduced the Bill, which, after some alterations had been introduced, would, no doubt, be likely to produce a beneficial result.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he congratulated the right hon. Baronet in getting out of the hands of Sir Henry Browning and the police of Ireland. He was amazed when Sir Henry Browning stated in the Committee that in order to make the Bill popular it should be placed in the hands of the police, and that any village constable could make an entry of a birth, death, or marriage as well as a clergyman of any religious denomination in Ireland. He was glad that the right hon. Baronet had given up so unpopular a scheme as that, because nothing could be more unpopular than to commit these duties to the Irish constabulary. He thought the doctors were the right men to whom they should be intrusted, and he was glad the right hon. Baronet had saved the Bill from what would have endangered it in that House, or, if passed, would have destroyed its working in Ireland. The alleged difficulty of getting dispensing doctors who had lucrative practices to act as registrars for a trifling remuneration could be met, if it existed, by giving the board of guardians power in such cases to appoint some other persons to act as registrars. Some observations had been made respecting the clerks to the boards of guardians, but from his experience he believed those gentlemen were well qualified to collect the statistics in the manner prescribed by the Bill.

MR. M'MAHON said, he was also glad that the right hon. Baronet had avoided the introduction of the police in the Bill. He should, however, find it his duty to oppose it, for reasons which he believed were largely shared in by the community in Ireland. The measure would entail upon the people of Ireland an expense of £16,000 a year at a time when all complained of being overtaxed for local purposes, and they naturally desired to know what return they would get. Social science might find some advantage in the statistics, but he believed the Bill would be of no real value unless it incorporated a provision for registering marriages. The right hon. Baronet said the Bill would be of great advantage in enabling persons to establish heirships, but what would be the use of proving a birth or death unless they also proved the marriage? He believed the timidity to introduce such a system arose from the unwillingness to repeal the penal enactment against Catholic priests who celebrated mixed marriages. If the right hon. Baronet would make up his mind to repeal that enactment, so opposed to the spirit of the present time, and would introduce a system of registration of marriages, he would entitle himself to the gratitude of the great bulk of the people of that country.

MR. GEORGE said; he must express his surprise, after so long a time had elapsed since the subject was first under discussion, that the right hon. Baronet had not thought proper to bring in a Bill relating to marriages as well as births and deaths. The Committee appointed by the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor which sat two years ago, and was composed of men of every creed and denomination, came to an almost unanimous resolution that there ought to be registration of marriages in Ireland, and that such a registration might be easily effected by the clergy of different denominations, who should receive a small fee, and send the registers to a chief office in Dublin. From the spirit manifested before that Committee, he did not anticipate there would be any difficulty in getting rid of the obnoxious Act of the 19th Geo. II., and of establishing a perfect system of registration for marriages as well as births and deaths. He thought that bugbear Act might be swept away with perfect safety to the Protestant religion, and without producing bad feeling on the part of any other denomination, if the subject were dealt with in a comprehensive spirit. In his opinion the Government had done wisely in dropping the plan of employing the constabulary, against which there were many grave and constitutional objections, but he hoped a wide discretion would be left to the Government or the boards of guardians, as a precaution against the possible inefficiency of the doctors in carrying out the provisions of the Bill, because it was not to be forgotten that doctors were not necessarily present at all deaths, and were only present at a proportionate number of births. As to the clerks of unions acting as superintendent registrars, they had no time to spare for duties extraneous to their office, and he doubted the propriety of giving them the appointment. He did not understand whether the registrars were to be paid out of the poor rate or county rate.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: The superintendent registrars will be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, and the registrars out of the poor rate.

MR. GEORGE said, it would be a greater boon to Ireland if the whole expense were borne by the Consolidated Fund. He did not think it was the part of a wise statesman to increase the local burdens in that country at a time when those burdens were too heavy for a large portion of the ratepayers, and when a very large amount of distress existed amongst the small tillage farmers of Ireland.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, in his opinion the right hon. Baronet had acted wisely in bringing in a Bill for the registration of births and deaths, and omitting marriages. The reason was obvious. Births and deaths were matters of fact, but questions of marriages involved other subjects of a far more difficult and delicate character, especially in a country like Ireland, where there were different religious denominations who celebrated marriages in a different way and on a different principle. In accordance with the highest authority among Roman Catholics in Ireland, he could state that the present marriage law was satisfactory to the largest portion of the population, and he would advise the Government not to get into hot water by interfering with it. On principle, the law as to mixed marriages was undesirable, because it was a penal law and produced no good effects, but he did not think that the grievance was at all felt in Ireland. No doubt marriages ought to be registered, and he was far from saying that a Bill for the purpose could not be concocted, but it ought to be dealt with as a separate question, and perfectly distinct from the registration of births and deaths. He was very glad, therefore, that it was not included in the Bill; and if the subject were referred to a Committee, he should be happy to give all the assistance which it was in his power to afford towards producing a satisfactory measure.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he agreed with the hon. Baronet (Sir George Bowyer) that it would be most difficult to deal with the marriage question in the same Bill that related to births and deaths. As regarded the charge upon the counties, it would only be five-sixteenths of a penny in the pound, and the total valuation of Ireland being £12,400,000, the charge imposed by the Bill would be a little more than £16,000. The charge, he thought, was too small to be the subject of serious objection on the part of the Irish Members.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the Registration of Births and

Deaths in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Sir ROBERT PEEL, Sir GEORGE GREY, and Mr. CARDWELL.

ECCLIASTICAL REVENUES.

SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he rose to move the reappointment of the Select Committee to inquire into the present state of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and to report to the House whether the Ecclesiastical Revenues could not be more advantageously administered for the interests of the Church than at present. The Committee sat last year, and before the close of its labours collected a large amount of evidence; and not having time to complete their investigation, had agreed to a Report recommending the reappointment of the Committee this Session. There was further evidence which it was desirable should be taken before the Committee made its Report, but he did not apprehend that the inquiry would be of a protracted nature.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed,

"To inquire into the present state of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and to report to the House whether the Ecclesiastical Revenues cannot be more advantageously administered for the interests of the Church than they are at present."

House adjourned at Twenty minutes before Eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, February 10, 1868.

THE CONVICT SYSTEM—TICKETS OF LEAVE.—QUESTION.

EARL STANHOPE said, he wished to put a Question to the noble Earl the President of the Council on the subject of tickets of leave. Their Lordships were aware of the numerous acts of violence which had been committed since last Session not only in London but throughout the country, and they also knew how general was the feeling of alarm caused by those outrages. There was also, he might say, a general conviction that the system of tickets of leave as framed by the Government eight or nine years ago, however good in theory, had not worked well in practice. It had been announced that a Royal Commission had been appointed to inquire into the whole subject; and he did not intend on the present occasion to anticipate in the slightest degree the conclusions at which that Commission might arrive; for, remembering the great ability and experience of many of the Gentlemen named as Commissioners, he had every hope that the inquiry would lead to some good and practical suggestion. But he could not conceal his own opinion that it would have been better for the public interests if, instead of a fresh Commission, instead of seeking for further information on a subject on which they already possessed ample knowledge, the Government had decided on independent action of their own and had brought forward on their own responsibility on the re-assembling of Parliament some measure of reform. He was informed, however, that pending the labours of the Commission, the Secretary of State considered the evil to be of so pressing a character that he had already taken some important steps with the view of mitigating the evil complained of. It was said that a circular had been issued to the chairmen of Quarter Sessions, and he thought it would be desirable that the noble Earl should state the object of that document. He apprehended that it had been issued for the purpose of diminishing the number of convicts set free periodically, and besides ascertaining the exact nature of the orders given, he should further like to know, whether any calculation had been made, founded on statistics, as to what the diminution was likely to be. He now begged to ask his noble Friend for information on those two points.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought it would be inconvenient to discuss a subject which had only just been referred to a Commission. He should, therefore, confine himself to saying that a circular such as that referred to by his noble Friend had been issued by the Home Office in regard to persons who were recommitted, having formerly been convicted of other offences. In the case of such persons, no expectation of a remission of any part of their sentence was to be held out. No other important step had been taken. In answer to the second inquiry of his noble Friend, he had only to observe that it would be impossible to say what number of persons were likely to be recommitted.

THE EARL OF DERBY wished to ask whether a convict who, having received a ticket of leave which was only a conditional exemption from a portion of his sentence, was again recommitted before the time at which that sentence had expired would, in addition to the new sentence received by him after recommitment, have to go through what remained of the previous one. The intention of the law certainly was that ticket-of-leave men found associating with thieves, or even leading a suspicious life, should forfeit their tickets and undergo the original sentence; but, except perhaps in Ireland, he did not believe that principle had been acted on in a single instance.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that in the country parts of Ireland a very strict police supervision had been observed in respect of ticket-of-leave men; but the fact that such a supervision had not been carried out in Dublin showed the difficulty there was in giving effect to a system of that kind in large towns. His noble Friend was, however, mistaken in thinking that there had been no case of the revocation of a ticket of leave in England. Recently ticket-of-leave men had been made amenable for leading disorderly lives, keeping company with thieves, or committing offences of which the general law of the country was not exactly cognizant. In the case of a recommitment, he believed the custom had been to include the entire punishment in the second sentence.

THE EARL OF DERBY observed, that in accordance with that custom, a convict who had received a sentence of ten years' imprisonment, and who obtained a ticket of leave after four years, leaving six years of his sentence unexpired, might derive a positive advantage from a second sentence, which would wipe out six years of the first.

LORD CRANWORTH said, that no difficulty would arise, because the Judge generally had a discretion as to the term of sentence he should inflict.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, he would make an inquiry of the noble Earl, of which he had not given notice, and which he would be happy to postpone if the noble Earl could not answer it immediately. It had been stated in a public journal some weeks ago in giving an account of the convict establishment at Portland, that the convict Redpath, who was sentenced to transportation for life in the year 1857, was now at liberty on a ticket of leave; and, as the writer added, in all probability enjoying the proceeds of his felony. It would be recollected that this person was convicted at the Central Criminal Court in 1857, for one of the most enormous forgeries which stood recorded in the annals of crime. The Judge, in sentencing him, said that an amount of property to the extent of £40,000 or £50,000 was found in his residence, the proceeds of his fraud; that he was a very hardened criminal; and that considering the enormity of the offence, he must sentence him to be transported for life beyond the seas. It was now stated, upon somewhat reliable authority, that this man was at large, and owing to the imperfect state of the law, having been able to assign his estate to his relatives, was now enjoying the fruits of his frauds undisturbed. He (the Duke of Marlborough) wished to know whether there was any truth in the statement, as, if true, it showed a very absurd and inefficient state of the law.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that he could not undertake to enter into the details of any individual case without previous notice, but he would make it his business to inquire into the truth of the statement alluded to. He thought the noble Duke, however, was wrong in supposing that Redpath was now at large upon a ticket of leave. The man had been transported for life, and was still in the colony, though he might have a ticket of leave.

LORD CRANWORTH said, that Redpath, having been sentenced to transportation for life, was sent out of the country accordingly. It was well known, that after being in the colony for some time, a convict who conducted himself satisfactorily received a ticket of leave, and Redpath might be at large in this way. He could not return to this country.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he understood from his noble Friend that the superintendence of the police over the holders of tickets of leave had been discontinued in consequence of the difficulty of carrying on that superintendence, although it was being rigidly carried out in Ireland. Now that put the whole question on a different footing, because he had always understood that the system had been found very effective in Ireland. He agreed with his noble Friend that the Government ought to have undertaken to deal with this subject, the responsibility being theirs exclusively. He would go even further, and say that the responsibility rested with a single individual. It was now fifteen years since Sir George Grey had undertaken the disposal of the criminal population. Since then he had been three several times Home Secretary, had had almost uncontrolled disposal of the Home Office, and had passed one or two Acts on the subject; and this being so, it was only fair to ask how we came to be landed in the present difficulty. It could not be said that Sir George Grey was without warning on this subject. Sir James Graham had warned him of the results which might be expected to follow from his measures, and, unfortunately, the predictions then made had been only too fully verified. He had beside received repeated practical warning by his own failures—failures which had been followed by repeated panics on the part of the public. Sir George Grey had mitigated the extreme penalty of the law frequently in opposition to the opinions of the Judges, thereby virtually absorbing the judicial functions in the office of Secretary of State, and, as he contended, trifling with that prerogative of mercy which, though it certainly belonged to the Crown, ought to be exercised very sparingly. Again, the conditions of the ticket of leave had been dispensed with on the irresponsible authority of the Secretary of State. He did not find any fault with the Commission which Her Majesty had been advised to issue. It comprised many able and experienced men, and no doubt any information which could be supplied on this question would be elicited by them. At the same time this was one of the questions which essentially belonged to the Executive, involving as it did the maintenance of order, and the security of life and property all over the country, and he thought that the appointment of a Commission was an unsatisfactory delegation of duty. Whatever might be their diligence, it would probably be late in the summer before they reported. A Bill would come up to this House, when their Lordships were in the thick of other work, and sufficient time would not be afforded for considering the subject.

EARL GRANVILLE was surprised at the attack made upon Sir George Grey by the noble Earl, upon the ground that he was wholly responsible for the doings of the Home Office during the last fifteen years.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I said he had had almost a monopoly of that office during the last fifteen years.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the fact was that transportation was given up in 1853, and Sir George Grey was not Secretary of State at the time. The system that was now pursued was exactly the same as that which had been adopted by his four predecessors in office, and Sir George Grey had pursued exactly the same course with regard to this matter as Mr. Walpole, who was the colleague of the noble Earl himself. With respect to the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown, if there was any instance of that exercise to which exception could be taken, the case should be brought before the House, when a reply could be given to it. With respect to the appointment of a Commission, it was a matter of opinion whether that was the best course; but he saw no reason to anticipate any great delay in dealing with the subject. A kind of panic had of late seized on the public mind—not unnaturally—but he believed that nothing could be more satisfactory to the public than the appointment of a Commission composed of eminent persons such as had been named.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, one point of importance had been raised by the discussion relating to a matter of jurisprudence, and it was a very important one, for the public mind had long been directed to the subject, from an idea that the power which was exercised by the Secretary of State rendered it in many cases extremely doubtful whether the sentences of the Judges would be carried into effect or not. He would be glad to know whether the learned Members of that House approved of that line of public conduct, which in his opinion tended to lessen the opinion which had hitherto been held by the public at large in reference to the character of the judgments that were given from the bench, and which had until lately been held sacred in the eyes of the public.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, February 10, 1863.

MINUTES.—SELECT COMMITTEE.—Public Petitions.—Select Committee appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Affirmations [Bill 11]; Illegitimate Children (Ireland) [Bill 13]; Church Rates Redemption [Bill 12]; Benchers' Jurisdiction and Authority [Bill 10].

LORDS COMMISSIONERS' SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSE—HOLD reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:—

"I receive with great satisfaction your loyal and dutiful Address.

"The interest you express in the Marriage of the Prince of Wales, and the attachment you entertain for My Person and Family are most gratifying to My feelings.

"You may be assured that I shall always be ready to co-operate with you in measures which have for their object to promote the happiness and welfare of My People."

THE VOLUNTEER FORCE.—QUESTION.

LORD HOTHAM said, that as great anxiety was felt in many parts of the country with respect to the proceedings of the Royal Commission appointed last year on the subject of the Volunteer Force, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, When he will announce the intentions of the Government with reference to the recommendations of the Royal Commission appointed last year to inquire into the state of the Volunteer Force?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would beg leave to state that it was the intention of the Government to adopt substantially the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners. The grant of a sum of money would be proposed along with the Army Estimates of the year, and when the subject was brought before the House he would enter into details on the measures requisite to carry these intentions into effect.

MUSIC AND DANCING LICENCES.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he desired to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is intended during the present Session to introduce any Bill with the view of improving the present system of licensing houses for music and dancing and for the sale of spirits?

MR. LAWSON said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he intends to propose any measure during the present Session for amending the laws by which the sale of intoxicating liquors is permitted and regulated?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Government had a Bill in course of preparation which proposed to effect an alteration with regard to the sale of spirits and beer —that was to say, in the mode of licensing public-houses and beerhouses. It did not, however, go beyond that object. The only question with respect to licensing music and dancing houses which had been brought under his notice was, whether such licences should be granted to persons also holding licences for the sale of beer and spirits. He could not undertake to say when the Bill would be introduced. There was a Bill before the House, or about to be submitted to its notice immediately, on the part of the licensed victuallers of Liverpool, applicable to that large town and dealing with the licensing system. He thought it desirable that that Bill should be considered before a general measure dealing with the same subject was proposed for discussion.

CONVICTS.—QUESTION.

MR. GARNETT said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will lay upon the table of the House the Circular, dated 27th of January, 1863, addressed to the Judges, &c., stating that the regulations as to remission of sentence set forth in the Circular of June 27th, 1857, should not apply to persons sentenced for a second time to penal servitude; and whether any instructions have been lately issued to the convict prisons as to making convicts about to be liberated on licence known to the police; and, if so, whether they also can be laid before Parliament?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, there was no objection to the production of the later Circular to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The Circular of the 27th of January was already before the House. In answer to his second question, he might state that no general instructions had been issued having for their object the making of convicts about to be liberated on licence known to the police throughout the country. To do that would, he believed, be hardly possible. Instructions had, however, been issued that certain officers of the Metropolitan Police should have an opportunity of seeing the prisoners at Milbank, with a view to their possessing greater facilities for the identification of those persons. The arrangements entered into for the purpose were at present suspended in consequence of the inquiry in progress, and it was deemed better that before new regulations were made on the subject an opportunity for an expression of opinion with respect to it on the part of the Royal Commission should be afforded.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT OF 1861.

QUESTION.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he wished to ask the Attorney General, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring in a Bill, in the present Session, to amend the Law of Bankruptcy; and whether provision will be made in any such Bill for the consolidation of the Statutes of Bankruptcy?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had to state to his hon. and learned Friend that the Government were not aware that any necessity existed for making any material amendments in the Law of Bankruptcy. But in regard to the administration of that Law, experience had convinced them more and more of the expediency of alterations being made, including, as was originally proposed, the appointment of a chief judge in bankruptcy. The Government would be prepared to recommend to the House a proposition of that nature, when it saw a fair chance of obtaining the sanction of Parliament. As to the consolidation of the Bankruptcy Law, he could state that the attention of the Lord Chancellor had been directed to the subject, but he could not promise that any measure would be introduced into Parliament for the purpose of such consolidation this Session.

AFFIRMATIONS.—LEAVE.

FIRST READING.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he rose to ask leave to introduce a Bill to allow certain persons to make affirmation in all cases where an oath was or should be required. He would only state that the Bill was substantially the same as the one of last Session, and which proposed to apply to this country the law in force in India.

Leave given.

Bill to allow certain Persons to make Affirmations in all cases where an Oath is or shall be required, ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN TRELAWNY and Mr. DILLWYN.

ILLEGITIMATE CHILDREN (IRELAND).

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR ROBERT PEEL moved for leave
Sir George Grey

to bring in a Bill to amend the law enabling boards of guardians to recover costs of maintenance of illegitimate children in certain cases in Ireland.

MR. HENNESSY said, the Poor Law Act for Ireland had proved to be wholly useless and inoperative, as predicted last Session, and he should be glad to hear what was the scope and object of the measure.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the Bill was merely for the purpose of putting a proper construction on one clause which was inserted in the Act of last year, on the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Mayo, there having been a difference of opinion amongst the chairmen of boards of guardians and the Law Officers of the Crown.

Leave given.

Bill to amend the Law enabling Boards of Guardians to recover costs of maintenance of Illegitimate Children in certain cases in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by SIR ROBERT PEEL and Mr. BAUCE.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 13.]

CHURCH RATES REDEMPTION.

Bill for Voluntary Redemption of Church Rates, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ALCOCK and Mr. EVANS.

BENCHERS' JURISDICTION AND AUTHORITY.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he rose to move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the law regarding the jurisdiction and authority exercised by the Benchers of the four Inns of Court in England in certain cases. The provisions of the Bill were precisely the same as those of that he introduced last Session. He would not go into its merits, or the reasons upon which it was founded, but he would only remind the House that his first Bill of last year was divided into two parts. The first part had reference to a reform of the constitution of the Inns of Court themselves; while the object of the second part was to institute a proper tribunal for the consideration of certain cases which came within the jurisdiction of the Benchers of the Inns of Court. There was considerable difference of opinion regarding the first part of the Bill. But it was thought by many that something ought to be done on the subject touched by the second part of the Bill, and he therefore consented that the Bill should be negatived in order that he might bring in another Bill which should be confined to the question of the Amendment of the Law in regard to the jurisdiction exercised by the Benchers of the Inns of Court in certain cases. That Bill was printed, and had no doubt been well considered during the vacation by those whom it concerned. What he proposed to do was to bring in that Bill again; and should leave be granted, he would give ample time to the Benchers to consider it, and he should be happy to receive any suggestions for the improvement of the measure. He thought public opinion was almost unanimous that something should be done on the subject. On the second reading of the Bill he would make a statement to the House of the details of the measure and the reasons upon which it was founded, and he hoped they would have such a discussion as would end in useful legislation.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he did not rise to offer any opposition to the Motion of the hon. and learned Baronet, but to state, that in the event of any other measure being introduced on the subject by the Benchers of the Inns of Court, who had at present vested in them this jurisdiction, it would be understood that both the Government and private Members would be at liberty to adopt their proposal, whether in a substantive form or by way of Amendment to the Bill. The subject was no doubt one of great importance, and he was at liberty to state to the House that it had received the attention of the Benchers of the Inns of Court, that communications had taken place between them and the Government, and that he was not without hope that the result would be the adoption of some measure which might be recommended to the House by their unanimous assent. Those communications had not yet advanced far enough to enable him to say whether such would be their result; but if anything were done, his hon. and learned Friend would have early information of it, and he hoped that the second reading of this Bill would not be pressed on so as to interfere with the deliberations of the Societies upon the subject.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the observations of the hon. and learned Baronet led him to suggest that some understanding should be come to as to the period at which the Bill should be read a second time. They were within a fortnight or so of the circuits, when many of the hon. and learned Members of the House would be out of town, and he hoped the hon. and learned Baronet would not bring on the second reading until after the assizes were over. It would be desirable that the Bill of the Benchers of the Inns of Court should be before the House before the second reading of this Bill.

Leave given.

Bill to amend the Law regarding the jurisdiction and authority exercised by the Benchers of the Four Inns of Court in England in certain cases, ordered to be brought in by Sir GEORGE BOWYER and Mr. HENNESSY.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 10.]

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

QUESTIONS.

Mr. HENNESSY said, he had a Question to address to the noble Lord at the head of the Government in reference to Poland, though he did not intend to enter at any length into the question. But as a Motion on that subject would probably be submitted for the consideration of the House very soon, it was very desirable that they should be in possession of some important papers which he understood to be in the hands of the Government. He referred to the correspondence which had taken place between England and Austria, and between England and France conjointly and Austria, about Poland—a correspondence which had chiefly taken place during the Crimean war. He wished to ask the noble Viscount whether a proposal was made by Austria to the effect that Austria would agree to join the allies if the independence of Poland were declared, and in certain other eventualities? He also wished to know whether, owing to the favourable attitude taken by Austria, it had not been proposed to bring the subject of Poland before the Congress of Paris in 1856, and whether on that occasion Lord Clarendon did not suggest that it would be undesirable to discuss the Polish question, inasmuch as he hoped the Emperor of Russia would grant reforms to the Poles. He begged to ask whether any such diplomatic action had taken place; and, if so, whether the noble Lord would have any objection to place it upon the table of the House?

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he desired to put the Question of which he had given notice in no unfriendly spirit to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. A grave trust, however, was imposed upon Ministers, especially during the recess of Parliament, and he believed that the action taken by the Government in reference to the Ionian Islands was almost unprecedented, and was such as to demand the serious consideration of Parliament. The question was whether during the recess a Minister could be at liberty, by a mere despatch, to relinquish territories which had once been de facto in possession of the British nation. The noble Lord drew a distinction between States held under a protectorate and those in full possession of the Crown; but, on examination, that distinction appeared to be merely verbal. In colonies, as in countries held under a protectorate, there was a superior Sovereign, a governor appointed by the Sovereign, and in both cases the country was occupied by a military force. When the harbour and fortress of Corfu was placed in our hands by the Treaty of 1816, was there any provision made for our ever relinquishing them? The noble Lord knows that those arrangements were intended to be permanent—Esto perpetua was written on every clause of that Treaty in the intention of its concoctors. Did the noble Lord mean to infer that the Government were at liberty during the recess to cast adrift any of our colonies? There was a great fortress at the other end of the Mediterranean, and the indifference with which the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, when he was a Member of this House, appeared to regard the possession of Tetuan by the Spaniards was calculated to inspire a belief that he did not attach greater importance to the retention of that military appendage, the fortress of Gibraltar, than he did to our holding the Ionian Islands. He would, therefore, conclude by asking the First Lord of the Treasury, How far the interpretation of the Prerogative of the Crown is considered by the Government to extend in empowering the Crown to relinquish territories which may have been in the de facto possession of the British nation without the knowledge and consent of Parliament.

MR. PEACOCKE said, that before the noble Viscount answered the question, he wished to call his attention to the present state of the question of the Ionian Islands. He was one of those who held the retention of the protectorate of the Ionian Islands to be by no means advantageous to this country; but he doubted whether Her Majesty's Government had acted with due circumspection in publishing to Greece, to the Ionian Islands, and the world that they were ready to cede these islands if two conditions were complied with, one being that the Greeks should choose a Sovereign acceptable to this country, and the other that they should succeed in obtaining the assent of the contracting Powers to the Treaty of Vienna to that cession. He thought that the Government ought to have obtained an assurance first that a candidate acceptable to this country would be elected, and next, that the assent of the other four contracting Powers to the cession of the Ionian Islands would be likely to be obtained. The candidate who was favoured by the noble Viscount had like some other favourites "bolted," and the announcement of the intended cession was, he feared, only likely to give an immense premium to the agitation for annexation that had previously existed in the islands. An hon. Gentleman stated the other evening that Corfu in the hands of the kingdom of Greece would be a standing menace to Turkey; but he (Mr. Peacocke) thought there was another country to which Corfu, in the hands of an aggressive Power, would be a far more serious menace, and that country was Austria. The commerce of the Adriatic was principally carried on with the port of Trieste. That port was the one great issue by which the products of Austria, containing some 40,000,000 inhabitants, were poured into the other marts of the world. 10,000 vessels entered that port every year. Therefore, he wished to know whether the noble Lord had obtained the consent of Austria to the cession of our protectorate over the Ionian Islands, or whether there was the least chance of his doing so? If he was correctly informed, the upper classes and the upper middle classes of these seven Greek Islands were Greeks only in name, and were really Italians descended from those Venetians under whose domination those Islands were so long. He thought it did not require the gift of prophecy to foresee that within a very few years after their annexation to Greece the inhabitants of the Ionian Islands might discover that they had made a remarkably bad investment, and a cry might then arise for annexation to some other country. Looking at the geographical position of Corfu, and the Italian descent of these islanders, it was by no means unlikely that they would demand to be annexed to the kingdom of Italy. An agitation of that kind would create the worst feeling between Austria and Italy, and would threaten to disturb the peace of Europe. If these Islands were annexed to the kingdom of Greece, there ought to be a stipulation that they should remain part and parcel of that kingdom, and should not be transferred to a sceptre under which they would become a standing menace to the tranquillity of Europe and the freedom of the Adriatic. If the consent of the four great Powers to the cession could not be obtained, the only result of the publication of the terms of cession by Her Majesty's Government would be to add fuel to the flame of dissatisfaction which had for some time prevailed in those Islands.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that in looking over the papers he saw no despatches from foreign Powers interested in the affairs of Greece and the Ionian Islands. He wished to know whether despatches had not been received from Austria in regard to the cession of these Islands; and, if so, why they were not laid upon the table?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am not able off-hand to answer the question of my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Roebuck), but I will make inquiry. I will first answer the question of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) on Polish Affairs. He desires to know whether during the Crimean war Austria did not propose to France and England, to combine with her for the purpose of re-establishing an independent kingdom of Poland, and whether that subject was not again mooted at the Conferences of Paris. I answer that no proposal was made during the Crimean war by Austria to England and France to combine with her for the purpose of establishing a separate kingdom of Poland; but that, on the contrary, as far as we were informed—and the information came from the Austrian Minister at Paris, rather than directly from Vienna—the Austrian Government would never have consented to such an arrangement. So far from inviting it, such an arrangement was one to which Austria would have had insurmountable objections. That which passed at the Conference of Paris is recorded in the protocols that have been laid before Parliament, and I am not aware that anything took place in those Conferences with regard to Poland which did not appear in the protocols that were laid on the table. Therefore the impression on the mind of the hon. Member that England and France received a proposition from Austria for the purpose of separating Poland from Russia, and establishing it as an independent State, is unfounded, and the hon. Member has been misinformed as to the course of that transaction.

The hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Darby Griffith) asks me whether it is competent, according to the constitution, for the Crown by its prerogative to alienate, without the consent of Parliament, possessions that belong to the Crown; and he contended that the Ionian Islands are, to all intents and purposes, a possession of the British Crown. He says we take a vague and imaginary distinction between these Islands and a colony, because a colony has a British Governor, and the Ionian Islands have also a British Governor, while there are British garrisons also in both. This rather reminds one of the observation that there was an identity between Monmouth and Macedon. There was a river in Macedon and a river in Monmouth, and there were salmon in both. I do not think that the hon. Member has established the identity on which his argument is founded. There is a broad and substantial distinction between the two, and not one merely of form. The Ionian Islands have not been ceded by any treaty to England as a possession of the British Crown. They were by the Treaty of 1815 erected, or rather re-constituted, a separate and independent State—the Republic of the Seven Islands—and that separate and independent State was placed under the protectorate of the British Crown, and not given as a possession to the British Crown. The distinction is manifest and radical; therefore I contend, that if the hon. Member were able to establish that it is not competent for the Crown by an act of its prerogative to aliate any British possession—any possession acquired by conquest or ceded to the Crown by treaty, that argument would not apply to the Ionian Islands, which are in a separate and entirely different category. But with regard to cases of territory acquired by conquest during war, and not ceded by treaty, and which are not therefore British freehold, and all possessions that have been ceded by treaty, and held as possessions of the British Crown, there is no question that the Crown by its prerogative may make a treaty alienating such possessions without the consent of the House of Commons. The history of the country furnishes numerous instances in which cessions of this kind have been made. To mention some of the most recent and strongest cases—I do not now speak of possessions occupied during war, and never fully and finally given to the British Crown, but possessions that have been legally vested in the Crown and afterwards ceded to some foreign Power—there were Senegal, Minorca, Florida, and the island of Banca—all of them for a greater or less period of time possessions of the British Crown, and they were all ceded by treaty to some foreign Power. Therefore, there cannot be a question as to the competency of the Crown to make such cessions. I can, however, relieve the hon. Member's mind with regard to Malta and Gibraltar, by assuring him that there is not the slightest intention on the part of the Crown of making a present of either of these possessions to any foreign Power. There has been a great deal of misapprehension in the public mind with regard to this question of the Ionian Islands, and people in general imagine that we have by a stroke of the pen made a present of them to Greece. But no such thing has been done. What we said was, that if they chose a Sovereign in whom the British Government could place confidence that he would govern the country internally upon liberal principles, and that externally he would abstain from aggression on his neighbours, then we would take those steps which were necessary for the purpose of ceding the islands to Greece. But it does not depend on the will of the British Crown singly to do so. Those islands were placed under British protection by a treaty signed by the great Powers of Europe—by the Powers who were parties to the Treaty of Vienna, and whose consent to the cession must be obtained. But then, again, we are not going, even with the consent of those Powers, to transfer the population of the islands to another Power if that population be not willing. There are, therefore, required for the cession the consent of the Powers who were parties to the treaties of 1815, and the acknowledged and official consent of those who are the organs of the national will of the Ionians. But none of those steps have been taken, because the case has not arisen. No Sovereign has been chosen for Greece as yet, still less any Sovereign answering the conditions upon which further steps were to be taken. The hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Peacocke) mentioned other conditions, which I agree with him would be indispensable; but, as the transaction has not arrived at that state in which one has to go into details, it is unnecessary to dwell on them. Undoubtedly it would be right, if those islands were to be annexed to Greece, that Greece should undertake by treaty not to alienate them, because it is quite clear that there might be arrangements by which the islands might come into the possession of some other foreign Power than Greece, to the detriment of neighbouring States. But we have not come to the point at which these details should be gone into. I wish the hon. Member (Mr. D. Griffith) and the House to understand that it is my opinion, founded on historical evidence, that the power to alienate even the possessions of the British Crown does exist in the Crown; but those islands are not possessions of the British Crown, and the transaction requires the consent of all the parties to the treaties of 1815. We have not taken any steps as yet to obtain that consent, because the transaction has not come to that point at which such proceedings on our part would be necessary.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he was one of those who thought that on the whole it was desirable that this country should give up the protectorate of the Ionian Islands; but the fault he found with Her Majesty's Government was this. It appeared to him that before they declared their willingness to consent to the annexation of the islands to Greece they ought to have ascertained secretly from the other parties to the Treaty of Vienna whether they would give their consent to such annexation. Let the House consider the position of matters. There had been an agitation in Greece for the annexation of the islands to that country; and Her Majesty's Government had declared to the islands their willingness that such annexation should take place. But what was the position of the other Powers parties to the treaty? His hon. Friend (Mr. Peacocke) had stated good reasons why Austria might object to the annexation. But the Government had thrown upon Austria all the odium of refusing to consent to a measure which was popular in the islands. He did not think that was acting either wisely or fairly. That was the objection which he made to the course taken by Her Majesty's Government. It was an objection which would doubtless be repeated in that House; and it would be for the Government to justify the publication of their intention—of their willingness, rather—to assent to the annexation of the Ionian Islands to Greece before ascertaining the wishes of the other Powers who were parties to the Treaty by which those islands were placed under the protectorate of Great Britain.

CHURCH RATES COMMUTATION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to offer his apology to the House for having been a few minutes late in his place, and consequently unable to answer when his name was called by the Speaker. He rose for the purpose of giving notice that he would, on the following day, move for leave to bring in a Bill "to establish a charge in lieu of Church Rates for the commutation thereof, and to afford facilities for the provision of other funds applicable to the purpose of Church Rates." In fact, his Motion would be for the re-introduction of the measure which the House permitted him to bring in at the close of the last Session, in order that it might be considered during the recess.

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. M'MAHON moved the second reading of the Bill, the object of which, he said, was to make the law the same for Ireland as for England and Scotland. Up to 1842 the law of the three countries on the subject of the Salmon Fisheries was identical. Therefore, up to 1842 every person had a right to fish in the tidal waters of Ireland, and no landed proprietor was entitled to put weirs in a river in derogation of such public right. The Commissioners upon Irish Fisheries in 1836 referred to the Reports of the Commissioners on British Salmon Fisheries, and reported that what was requisite for them would be generally found sufficient for the fisheries of Ireland. Nothing was done upon that Report; but in 1842 an Act was passed with reference to Ireland, upsetting all previously established law and disregarding every principle of public justice. He had searched the Journals of the House, and could find no trace of any statement being made in introducing that measure. The Bill passed without comment, and a Gentleman informed him that it was passed through Committee so fast that another Member said, "This must be a flagrant Irish job, for not a single Irish Member says a word about it." It was a most flagrant and outrageous job, and the main object of this Bill was to repeal those sections of the Act of 1842 which were named in the schedule. The 18th section of that Act pretended to raise a doubt whether persons possessed of a several fishery might erect stake nets and stake weirs in the sea and tide ways, although persons had been successfully prosecuted for attempting to do so, and the section then proceeded to give them such right. The 19th section gave a right to any one interested in fee or by a term of not less than fourteen years in adjoining lands where no several fishery existed to erect stake nets and stake weirs, provided they were not injurious to the navigation. But they were detrimental to navigation, and this was a most monstrous encroachment on the public rights. Another provision saved the rights of persons who had had stake nets and stake weirs for more than twenty years; so that persons who for all that time had defied and violated the law were thenceforward empowered to do so with impunity. The 26th section provided that no stake net should go below low-water mark; but one of the most effectual contrivances for ruining the Irish fisheries was the bag net, and sometimes, he believed, they were carried three-quarters of a mile below low-water mark. The Act of 1842 was not only pernicious to the public, but most unwisely drawn for the interests of the individuals whom it was intended to benefit. It had to be amended in 1844, in 1845, in 1846, in 1848, and again in 1850. There never was anything like it in England. English legislation was directed to abolish weirs in tidal rivers as nuisances, and numerous were the Acts passed for that purpose. The ancient mode of proceeding had fallen into desuetude. The remedy by indictment was dilatory, and there were no means of recovering the expenses from the wrongdoers. In 1861, therefore, the Act was passed for England giving a summary mode of enforcing the law, and by this Bill he proposed to extend the benefit of that legislation to Ireland. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt) had announced it to be his intention to move, by way of Amendment to the Motion of the second reading of the Bill, that it was desirable that a Royal Commission should be appointed fully to inquire into the rights of the owners of property secured by the existing law regulating Irish fisheries, before any legislation on the subject took place. He, however, contended that ample inquiry in that respect had already been made, as was evidenced by the number of Reports which had been laid before the House; while he protested against the argument that his measure would, if passed, confiscate the property which rightfully belonged to any individual, the only persons with whose property it would interfere being those who claimed a right to set up weirs in contravention of the rights of the public, of patentees, and of the inland proprietors. It was absurd to maintain that the Legislature, having been tricked into the passing of such an Act as that of 1842, which he must characterize as a job, was not now at liberty to retrace its steps. He must further observe, that if any of the Encumbered Estates Court Commissioners had ever given the assurance to a purchaser of land under the Court that the Act of 1842 would never be repealed, he deserved to be removed from his position for selling property under a false suggestion. He did not, however, believe that any such assurance had been given; while, if the person making the purchase simply proceeded on the suggestion of their own agents, and merely speculated on the non-occurrence of a particular event, they had not, in his opinion, the slightest claim to compensation. The Act of 1842, beyond all doubt, confiscated the common law right of the public in the common of piscary; and that being so, he asked the House to assent to his Bill, and thus assimilate the law of Ireland to that of England. He had brought the question of salmon fisheries more than once before the House as a test to ascertain whether the same laws could be secured for both countries; but he regretted to find that the saying of Swift was still applicable, and that it would appear as if the British Government sent their young statesmen to learn that which was best and most beneficial in the laws of every other country, and applied to Ireland the very reverse. He hoped, however, that on the present occasion the House would sanction, by a large majority, the extension to Ireland of the provisions of the English Act relating to the Salmon fisheries, and in that hope he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

Mr. BUTT said, he rose to move the Amendment of which he had given notice, and which asserted the expediency of further inquiry, either by a Royal Commission or before a Committee of that House, before legislation on the subject under discussion took place, for he contended that the operation of the Bill would be to unsettle those rights of property existing in the owners of land abutting the shore in Ireland which it was the object of the measure of 1842—a measure deliberately sanctioned, and in no way deserving the appellation of a job—to establish. That which was called the foreshore belonged, he admitted at once, as a general rule, to the Crown in trust for the public; but in England, and, to a still greater extent, in Ireland, the proprietors of the adjoining land were also frequently the proprietors of the foreshore, and had in more than one instance successfully upheld their claim to it as against the Crown. Disputes having in several instances arisen on the subject, the whole question of the Irish fisheries was in 1842 brought under the notice of the House by the Government of the day; the present Earl of St. Germans having been at the time Secretary for Ireland, and Mr. Smith, who was now the Master of the Rolls in that country, and who was thoroughly acquainted with the subject, having been one of his law advisers. The Act passed under their auspices gave to proprietors of land along the coast certain rights of property between high and low water mark, and those rights, deliberately guaranteed by the Legislature and hedged round by certain restrictions, it was proposed by this Bill altogether to set aside. His hon. and learned Friend, in seeking to carry out his object, professed to be extremely desirous of assimilating the law in Ireland to that in operation in this country; but then he had omitted to introduce into his Bill, in several respects, provisions which would completely have that effect, while he seemed to attach no weight to the fact that the statements in the public press, as well as the reports of the Inspectors, went to show that the Irish fisheries had greatly improved of late years. What he and those whom he represented wanted was that a Royal Commission should inquire into this subject; and if it could be shown that the lower proprietors took an unreasonable quantity of salmon, he should not object to such a modification of the law as would make a more equitable division of the fish. If it was true, as the hon. and learned Gentleman said, that the erection of a private weir was an indictable offence, why should the House be troubled with a Bill of this nature? But it was impossible that the hon. and learned Gentleman himself could seriously contend that the doing of a thing authorized by an Act of Parliament was an indictable offence. That Act gave to every landed proprietor the right of fishing by means of stake nets fixed in the bed of the river adjoining his land. The right of fishing in that particular way had even been made the subject of marriage settlements, and it involved a considerable amount of property. Not only rich men, but poor men also, were interested in the non-disturbance of the existing fishery law. Several poor industrious men had taken leases of plots of land adjoining rivers, mainly for the purpose of obtaining a livelihood from the fish they might catch in the weirs fixed in the rivers adjoining these plots of land. But he utterly denied that the salmon fisheries of Ireland were injured by these stake nets. It was in the Blackwater and the estuary of Waterford that most of those engines were to be found, and yet in both those places the Commissioners in the year 1861 admitted that the fisheries had not within the memory of man been in a better state. This was no question of the preservation of the fisheries; it was solely a question between the upper and the lower proprietors. The only objection to the stake nets was that they were too effectual; but if they caught too much fish, the proper plan would be, not to abolish them altogether, but to limit the time during which they should be used. The effect of this Bill would be to destroy the commercial fisheries of Ireland for the benefit of the upper proprietors, and to such an injustice he would never consent. He had some right to complain of the way in which this Bill had been forced on, the second reading being moved on the first Wednesday of the Session, when many hon. Members who were greatly interested in the subject were absent; and as he believed that inquiry ought to precede legislation, he moved as an Amendment—

“That any legislation affecting the rights of the owners of property secured by the existing laws regulating Irish fisheries, ought to be preceded by a full and complete inquiry either by a Royal Commission or a Committee of this House.”

COLONEL LUKE WHITE, in seconding the Amendment, said, that he desired to explain, first, that he did so as a private Member of that House, and not as a Member of the Government; and, secondly, that his family were not nearly so largely interested in the preservation of stake nets as seemed to be supposed. He did not believe that his father's interest in stake nets amounted to £200 a year; and although he should be sorry to lose that, yet he should not feel disposed to imitate the example of the gentleman who last year, said that if his weirs were taken from him, he should hang himself. The lower proprietors of Ireland were very much dissatisfied with the result of the inquiry last year before the Committee of that House, on which they were not fairly represented, and they were most anxious that the subject should receive further investigation before there was any legislation. The principal argument of the “Abolitionists,” as they were called in Ireland—that was, those who were anxious to do away with stake nets—was that for the last ten years the fisheries had been gradually declining, until there was now hardly any fish left. This assertion was directly contradicted by the Reports of the Commissioners, all of which, from the year 1853 to 1859 inclusive, spoke of the fisheries as steadily and progressively improving—

1853.—“We have pleasure in referring to the marked improvement which has taken place in the Salmon Fisheries throughout this country.”

1854.—“We are glad to report that the Fishery Laws are working well, and to this source may be attributed the increased prosperity which has been observable during the year in the Irish Salmon Fisheries.”

1855.—“As regards the Inland or Salmon Fisheries, we are happy to announce that they are progressing and rapidly improving.”

1856.—“The Salmon Fisheries are steadily increasing in value, and in most cases are in a prosperous and flourishing condition.”

1857.—“With respect to the Salmon or Inland Fisheries, we are enabled to report a progressive improvement.”

1859.—“The state of the Salmon Fisheries continues to be satisfactory.”

It was not until 1860 that Mr. Fennell, one of the Commissioners, had altered his views. In his Report of that year, he stated that the fisheries had fallen off. He (Colonel White) admitted that fixed engines, more particularly bag nets, had increased of late years, but movable engines and salmon rods had increased to a much greater extent. While fixed engines had between the years 1852 and 1861 increased in number from 275 to 409, being an addition of 134, the number of movable engines had grown from 937 to 1,224, an increase of 287; and that of salmon rods from 899 to 1,757, an increase of 858. The whole amount of licence duty now collected in Ireland amounted to £5,217, of which about £2,300 was paid by the stake nets. If these nets were abolished, how was that large amount of duty to be replaced? It was said, by draught and drift nets; but such nets were used principally by poor fishermen who could not afford to pay the licence, and in some rivers, as for instance the Shannon, they could not be used at all. He approved the clause in this Bill which provided that there should be a gap in every stone weir to enable fish to go up the river; but he regretted that the measure contained no prohibition of netting in fresh water, a mode of fishing which had always been steadily condemned by Mr. Fennell, and which in his (Colonel White's) opinion was quite as necessary as the abolition of stake or bag nets. It had been urged in favour of this Bill that it would assimilate the law of Ireland to that of England; but it appeared from the reports of the proceedings of some of the Boards of Conservators that the English Act did not give entire satisfaction to those who were interested. He was not opposed to legislation. On the contrary, he was prepared to meet Gentlemen half-way if they would only do what was fair and not attempt to take everything from them. Although they were called robbers and poachers, they held their fisheries under an Act passed in 1842, and therefore he thought that this House ought not lightly—or he might say violently—to interfere with the rights of fishery proprietors. For all these reasons, he hoped that the House would not allow this Bill to pass into law without some further inquiry.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word, “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “any legislation affecting the right of owners of property secured by the existing laws regulating Irish Fisheries, ought to be preceded by a full and complete inquiry, either by a Royal Commission or by a Committee of this House,”—instead thereof.

Mr. LONGFIELD said, it was satisfactory to hear the declaration of the hon. and gallant Member for Kidderminster (Colonel White); but though he spoke as a private individual, no doubt he had done all in his power to enlist the antipathies of the Government to the Bill without success. For himself, he (Mr. Longfield) disclaimed being actuated by any private interests or motives whatever. To what purpose would this Royal Commissioner, if appointed, direct his inquiries? There had been already no less than ten or twelve Reports upon questions connected with Salmon Fisheries in different parts of the United Kingdom; but none of them, he admitted, were calculated to afford satisfaction to the opponents of this Bill, for they had all resulted in the damning fact that stake nets and bag nets were most injurious to the public interests. For his own part, he denied that he was interested in this question, either as an upper, a lower, or a shore proprietor. He was simply one of the public, and in that perfectly impartial capacity he had arrived at the conclusion that these weirs were detrimental to the fisheries themselves and injurious to the interests of the public. Under the existing legislation the public had been plundered by illegal weirs, and by weirs injurious to the navigation; yet, neither the Board of Admiralty nor the Board of Fisheries had interfered. At present the public were entirely without a remedy for illegalities and breaches of the fishery laws, though these might take place under their very eyes. They were tossed like a shuttlecock from the Lords of the Admiralty to the Fishery Commissioners, and each of these bodies shifted upon the other the responsibility of interference. But for the colourable and doubtful rights which had grown up under the Act of 1842 all these irregularities could and would be cleared away in a single week. The hon. and gallant Member for Kidderminster (Colonel White) had overlooked one very important Report in which the official framers stated that the supply of salmon was not as satisfactory as in previous years, and expressed fears that the high price of salmon was producing "an improvident desire for over capture." The appointment of a Royal Commissioner would be a discreet mode of getting rid of a difficult subject, as before that tribunal the whole of the 320 individuals claiming vested rights of the objectionable nature affected by the Bill would claim a right to be heard, and with dexterous management the inquiry might be protracted during the existence of the Ministry, and the existing state of things continued for the lives of all parties concerned. No doubt as to the illegality of Scotch weirs existed before the Act of 1842. The rights of shore proprietors and even of the Crown were well defined; neither had the least shadow of a right to erect a weir upon the foreshore. The public, on the other hand, were at liberty to fish freely in all the estuaries—and properly so, because the support of whole families depended upon the fish which might be caught. It was as members of the public that foreshore proprietors acquired the right of fishing, which they were enabled, indeed, to exercise more profitably than others, from being always on the spot and able to take advantage of favourable opportunities. There never was a more glaring invasion of private rights than the Bill of 1842, which in the estuary of Waterford alone at one fell swoop deprived thousands of hardy fishermen of their means of livelihood. It was contended that the Act of 1842 legalized stake weirs and fixed engines, but all he could say was that two of the ablest judges on the Irish bench decided that it did not. The assimilation of the law of England to that of Ireland and the opening of free gaps in the different weirs would go far to remedy and redress the injustice done by the hasty and improvident Act of 1842, would ultimately benefit those who were now opposing the Bill, and would immediately and very largely benefit the great mass of Her Majesty's Irish subjects.

MR. HASSARD said, he could not but regret that a subject which resolved itself into a struggle between the interests of different classes had not been taken up by the Government and dealt with as a public matter. He could not better express his feelings on the subject than by reading a speech of Mr. Barry, delivered at a meeting of the Royal Dublin Society. Mr. Barry, a Fishery Commissioner, said, he deplored the conflict which commenced last summer between the proprietors of the upper and the lower part of the rivers, which had led to a state of society, with regard to the fishing interest, of a most appalling nature. There never had been till now such disgraceful poaching as existed in the upper waters. And Mr. Barry concluded his remarks by saying, that if the contest was to be continued, he trusted that the parties would act with moderation, that he was for placing the bag and the stake nets under proper restrictions; but, he said, he was sorry to see it proposed to abolish those nets, which took the fish in the best possible condition. The House ought not, however, to take away the rights conferred by or purchased under Act of Parliament without affording compensation to the owners. He hoped, with a view of determining the question of the legality of the weirs and of restraining them within proper bounds, so that each person should obtain a fair exercise of the public right of fishing, a Royal Commission would issue, and that the Government should hereafter introduce legislation on the subject.

MR. J. B. SMITH, as a Member of the Committee which sat last year upon the subject, said, he desired to mention that in the case of the Tweed the removal of the fixed nets had led to a large increase in the number of fish, which had previously fallen from 40,000 to 4,000, and that those who thought themselves aggrieved by the abolition now found themselves benefited, as well as those in the upper waters. Every Committee that had been appointed to inquire into the subject were unanimous in recommending the abolition of fixed engines. They were the ruin of all our fisheries; and if this mode of fishing were persevered in it would end in the extinction of the salmon fisheries of this country. The French Government had become alarmed on the subject of their fisheries from the same cause, and he believed there was now a proposal to abolish fixed engines altogether.

MR. HODGSON said, that the size and quantity of salmon in English rivers had been already greatly benefited by the legislation that had taken place. The increase in the Tweed and other rivers had been so great within the last two years that he had never before seen one-tenth the present quantity of fish. He trusted the House would soon abolish fixed nets altogether.

MR. MONSELL said, he considered it very desirable that some arrangement should be made which would put an end to the present contention between the proprietors of the upper and lower waters. There was a vehement agitation going on in Ireland upon the subject, and both sides seemed to take up the question in a spirit of partisanship, and to forget, when propounding their plans, that there were other interests concerned than those which they advocated. If these fixed nets were abolished, for fifty miles of the Shannon no fish would be caught. But what had roused the supporters of this Bill to action was, that the Act of 1842 had been most outrageously abused by the multiplication of weirs in all directions, by taking the measurement of low water at the neap tides, instead of the spring tides, and by throwing out bag nets. Now, to argue while these modes of taking fish were in use that the breed of salmon was increasing was the strangest doctrine he had ever heard. The strong agitation upon the subject which existed in Ireland, and which was increasing throughout the country, afforded a sufficient reason why the Government should take up the question, and, with the full and ample information they possessed, propose such a measure as would deal impartially with both of the disputing parties, and would be accepted by a great majority in the House. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, with the assistance of the Fishery Commissioners, might frame a Bill which should be satisfactory to all parties. He would suggest that there should be no weirs except Scotch weirs with only one bag, that the low water of the neap tides should be taken as the boundary, and that those weirs should be altogether prohibited which did not come within the spirit of the Act of 1842.

COLONEL DUNNE said, the main question was whether Parliament would abolish the use of engines which were once deemed poaching, and the prohibition against which was taken off by the Act of 1842. The present system, if it were allowed to go on, would end in the entire destruction of salmon. One individual alone had exhausted the rivers of several districts in the West of Ireland by his fixed engines. He agreed that it was the duty of the Government to endeavour to settle this question. Why should not the Secretary for Ireland take this Bill under his protection and assist the Irish Members in passing it? There had been already twelve inquiries into this subject—why have another? Every Commission and Committee since 1842 had recommended the abolition of fixed engines. Parliament was therefore in a position to legislate in this sense.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that it was his intention to have addressed only a few words to the House, because, as the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Wexford was almost identical with that of last Session, which was read a second time and referred to a Select Committee, it would be conformable to the practice of the House to permit the Bill to be read a second time rather than refer it to a Commission or Select Committee. It was now said, however, that the Government ought to take charge of a measure of this kind. But from the discussion that had this day taken place it was clear that a very strong and marked difference of opinion existed between the proprietors of the upper and lower fisheries in the rivers frequented by salmon, and it was almost hopeless to imagine that any measure could be framed at the present time which would enlist the support of both classes. He was, however, ready to undertake the task if it were thought desirable that he should do so. As to the question of public and private rights which had been raised in the course of the discussion, he held that public rights were entitled to protection, while he also thought that where private rights had been acquired they should be respected also. He did not want to see private rights destroyed without full consideration. The Act of 1842 legalized those fixed engines which had existed for twenty years prior, and the question arose whether those fixed engines ought to be absolutely removed without compensation to the owners. Now, he thought it would be very unfair towards the proprietors if those legalized rights should be thus destroyed by any Bill. But, on the other hand, if it were true that the salmon in the rivers of Ireland had been very considerably diminished, it was certainly an occasion on which the Government and Parliament should interfere. On that point also, however, there was a vast difference of opinion. On the one side it was said that the rivers were entirely depopulated of the fish, and on the other that the fisheries were never before so flourishing. Mr. Fennell stated last year that, though before the passing of the Act of 1842 the fisheries were brought to a very low ebb, they had been improving ever since, and that the upper part of the rivers never equalled in value the lower, in which the greater part of the fish was taken. He quite agreed in the latter opinion with Mr. Fennell. It was a well-known fact that the salmon, after leaving the salt water, gradually deteriorated in quality until it returned again to the sea. With regard to the course to be pursued on the present occasion, the hon. and learned Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt) had suggested a Commission to consider the subject. He (Sir Robert Peel) thought they had had enough of Commissions and Committees. Since 1826 they had had ten or twelve Commissions and Committees, which had fully considered the subject. He concurred in the opinion of the right hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) that they were in possession of sufficient information without going again to a Commission, which would only retard the settlement of the question. If legislation was required, it ought to be proceeded with at once. He should be, therefore, very glad if the House would permit him, and he should obtain the sanction of the Government, to take charge of a Bill this Session upon the basis suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick. If his

hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) would consent to withdraw his Bill on the understanding that a Bill was to be framed on the basis suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick ["No, no"], he should be very glad to undertake the measure ["No, no."] He would state exactly the length to which he was prepared to go in the preparation of that Bill. He would propose to give greater powers to the Commissioners in regard to the opening of gaps, removing obstructions in rivers and estuaries, and making the proprietors of weirs pay for them. Secondly, he would open all gaps for thirty-six hours instead of twenty-four, in accordance with the English Act—that is, from Saturday evening to Monday morning. Thirdly—and this was very important—he would limit the projection of stake nets and Scotch weirs to low water at neap tides, instead of low water at spring tides, as at present; and he would also limit the projection of bag nets. He would also make the licence-tax proportionate to the entire proceeds of the weirs—that is, to the produce of the engines for which the licence was paid; and, lastly, he would increase the penalties for infringing the law. Upon those bases he would be quite willing to undertake the conduct of a Bill, which might not go so far as that of the hon. and learned Gentleman, but would, he believed, be an equitable arrangement. If the House did not approve his proposal, he was prepared to vote for the second reading of the Bill now before them; because, as the Bill had passed a second reading last year, it would only be fair, under all the circumstances, not to oppose it. If, however, the House desired that he should undertake a measure such as he had described, he would labour particularly that no further fixed engines should be erected in places frequented by salmon, and he would limit the privilege to those which were now legally erected. He should be glad to adopt the course he had suggested if the hon. and learned Member would give two or three days for further consideration; if not, he was prepared to support the second reading.

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, he had heard with great satisfaction the statement of the right hon. Baronet. Having been a Member of the Committee which sat on the subject last year, he had come to the conclusion that it would be impossible ever to settle the question, unless some concessions were made on both sides. In coming to an agreement on this question they should distinctly understand what they were to agree to. The provisions of the Act of 1842 were not exactly as he understood them to be stated by the right hon. Baronet, for he said that that Act legalized weirs fixed before it passed. But the Act of 1842 went a great deal further, for it not only legalized existing weirs, but enabled any occupier to put up a weir. The consequence was that enormous abuses of the powers of the Act had taken place. It could never have been contemplated by the framers of the Act that those weirs should have been extended as they had been. The most important point to be considered was, how far they should go with the Act of 1842, and how far restrict the powers then given? He himself should be for allowing all the weirs which had been legally established since 1842 to remain, and for giving the most stringent powers to put down those which had exceeded the limits legalized under that Act. He thought they might fairly come to a compromise. He would recommend the hon. and learned Member for Youghal to withdraw his Amendment, and the hon. and learned Member for Wexford to postpone the further consideration of the Bill until the measure of the Government should be produced. ["No, no!"]

LORD NAAS said, he was glad the Government showed a disposition to arbitrate on this difficult question. However, he could not agree in the recommendation which had been made to postpone the Bill, because a good deal of time would be lost, and the propositions of Government could easily be made in the course of the Bill through Committee. The questions raised by the hon. Baronet involved matter for most earnest consideration, and he was afraid some of his proposals would hardly be sufficient to meet the ends in view. The existence of stake nets and bag nets in the preservation of the breed of salmon was, in his opinion, totally inconsistent with the country. He hoped the House would consent to the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. W. O. GORE thought that the right hon. Baronet was in error when he spoke of extending the close time from twenty-four to thirty-six hours. Thirty-six hours was already allowed. ["No, no!"] No hon. Member had denied that the effect of the Act of 1842 was a transference of property from one body of proprietors to another.

Mr. H. A. Herbert

Mr. GEORGE entirely approved the course taken by the right hon. Baronet, who had ample information in his hands, and thought it was a great pity that the subject had not been taken up by Her Majesty's Government from the first. He was sure that in the hands of the right hon. Baronet no attempt at injustice to any party whatever would be made.

Mr. M'MAHON said, he would strongly recommend the right hon. Baronet not to meddle with this question, because he would have quite enough to do with other measures which he might introduce. As for himself, he would admit of no compromise; but in Committee the right hon. Baronet might propose his Amendments, and if they were acceptable to the Gentlemen who acted with him, he (Mr. M'Mahon) should be willing to give them every consideration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

LORD RAVENSWORTH, in rising to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the Report of the Royal Commission appointed to consider the Question of Harbours of Refuge, and to ask if any steps are in progress to carry out the recommendations of the Commissioners which are contained in that Report, said, he believed that the present stagnation of public affairs, and the very mild tone of party feeling which happily prevailed, afforded a favourable opportunity for mooted a question of great national importance, and one which was regarded with much interest by the mercantile community. It was now ten years since this subject had engaged the attention of Parliament. It was first considered by a Select Committee of the House of Commons, and in 1858 was referred to a Royal Commission composed of most able and distinguished men, who after a long and careful inquiry presented their Report in 1859. In the first page of that Report it was stated that the annual loss of property caused by wrecks upon our coast, which was as much a loss to the nation as the burning of so many stacks of corn, was upon an average of six years, £1,500,000, and on the average 800 lives were lost every year from the same cause. In one year, indeed, there had been as many as 1,500 lives lost. The Commission in their Report pointed out certain exposed parts of the coast where harbours of refuge might properly be formed. He would not, however, refer to those places, because the question involved in the choice of sites was independent of the general question of the expediency of harbours of refuge. But considering how long this subject had been mooted, and how great was the annually increasing loss of life and property, he might fairly ask why no attempt had been made to carry out the recommendations of the Commissioners? The objections to such a course, independently of the difficulty and expense, were various. There were, it was true, some persons who declared that these harbours of refuge, if constructed, would be useless and unserviceable, that they would speedily silt up, and that they would afford no substantial protection to our shipping. To that opinion he could only oppose the opinions and recommendations of the Royal Commissioners. It was upon this point that he desired at this moment to bring the question to an issue. He should be glad to know from the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Somerset) whether he entertained any such belief, and what proposal the country might expect from the Government upon this subject. Another strong prima facie objection to the construction of these harbours arose from a cause which he feared could not be denied, and that was the apathy of the shipowners themselves. It was said that if these harbours were constructed small maritime towns would rise up around them, and they feared that the crews of vessels would be induced, under pretext of taking refuge, to run into these harbours, and there idling away time that might be profitably spent. There might or might not be some force in this statement, but there were two sides to every question, and when a vessel was tossed by the winds and waves upon an iron-bound coast, and certain death and destruction awaited the seaman and his ship provided he could not make a harbour, we should consider what now were the feelings of a crew so doomed, and what their feelings would be if they could obtain protection in a safe harbour. That was the true point of view from which to regard this question. Again, it was very generally stated that shipowners were in the habit of sending to sea unseaworthy vessels, imperfectly equipped and manned; that they were indifferent as to what became of the ship and cargo, the value of which was covered by the insurance; and that this accounted for a large proportion of the losses which every year took place upon the coast. He trusted that this accusation was not quite so well founded as many appeared to think it was. Certainly, during the late gales which had visited our coasts, many fine and well-equipped vessels had been unable to stand the fury of the storm, and had foundered; among them he might name the Life-guard, a fine iron steamship plying between London and Newcastle, which went down during the last gale, with all her crew and passengers, amounting to sixty persons. It was more than probable, that if a harbour of refuge had existed on that part of the coast, as recommended by the Commissioners, a ship of this class would have been saved. With regard, however, to the charge against the shipowners, it must be remembered that every rag of protection had been stripped from them; they had been exposed upon their own shores to the unlimited competition of foreign ships, which were navigated, equipped, and built at much less expense than their own; and therefore it ought not to excite surprise if in some instances they had been compelled, in carrying on this competition, to send to sea ships badly found and not fully manned. That was a point, however, which he would not now argue. He had recently referred to the report of the National Lifeboat Institution, whose great services were well known; and he found it stated that within the last twelve years 7,640 lives had been lost upon our coasts, while in the last six years 16,119 lives had been saved by the boats and other appliances of the Institution. It was also stated that the wrecks had increased from 1,141 in 1855 to 1,494 in 1861. Those facts proved that, notwithstanding all the efforts of private benevolence, other means were required to meet the increasing risks which our enlarged commerce entailed, and the best means that could be suggested, he thought, was that the Government should take steps to provide harbours of refuge upon the most exposed portions of our coasts. England was now the depôt for the commerce of the world, and our policy of late had been to attract hither the largest portion of the carrying trade, and consequently the number of lives and amount of property at stake were continually increasing. The more, then, they made our coasts secure, the more they would succeed in their design. The attention of Parliament had been drawn to this subject in former Sessions. In 1858 a Resolution was moved in the House of Commons urging the Government to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee respecting harbours of refuge. That Resolution was carried, notwithstanding the opposition of the Government; but nothing was done. In 1860 another Resolution was moved, but was lost, the Government objecting not to the merits, but that there were no funds then available for the requisite outlay. The main reason for his bringing forward this subject at the present time might be stated under three heads. In the first place, it had been recently stated that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to show a surplus upon the revenue and expenditure of the year, and he thought that before any available means were disposed of it was right that the attention of the Government should be called to this most important subject. He was afraid, however, that that surplus was rapidly approaching its vanishing point. Another reason for his troubling the House upon that occasion was that he thought that convict labour, to a large extent, might usefully be employed upon such works as he referred to; and he further thought that the necessary demand for free labour which would also be required would afford the means of mitigating the distress now existing in Lancashire and Cheshire. Whatever course the Government might feel called upon to take, he had felt it to be his duty to call their attention to a subject so vitally important to a large portion of the population of these islands. He wished to ask, Whether any steps were in progress to carry out the recommendation of the Harbour of Refuge Commissioners?

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that any one who looked at the list of casualties at sea annually presented to Parliament must entertain the same feelings as the noble Lord who had just sat down, and must anxiously desire that the Government should do all within its power to reduce the number of wrecks that take place upon our coasts. But the question opened a vast subject, which required to be dealt with upon other considerations than those which at first sight presented themselves. It was true that in 1858 a Committee of the House of Commons proposed that harbours of refuge should be constructed on our coasts, and recommended that the cost should be defrayed to the extent of one-fourth by the Government, and as to the remainder by passing tolls to be levied upon shipping. They also recommended that trading harbours should be made in some of the smaller ports, by improvements to be effected by means of loans. The Committee did not specify the precise points where the harbours of refuge should be made, but they recommended the appointment of Commissioners to survey the coast, and accordingly a Royal Commission was appointed in 1859. The Commission took evidence on the subject, and advised that passing tolls should be given up; therefore three-fourths of the funds designated by the Committee for making the harbours had been at once withdrawn. The Committee had recommended that £2,000,000 should be expended on the works—the Commission recommended an expenditure of £4,000,000, and that the greater part of it should be charged on the Consolidated Fund, and the remainder raised from local resources. No sooner was that recommendation made than all the persons connected with the localities in which harbours of refuge were to be constructed represented that it was quite idle to call on them to raise £1,500,000 in order to make harbours of refuge; they could do nothing of the kind; they might as well be called on to pay the national debt. It appeared, then, that such harbours, if made at all, must be made entirely by the country. Then the ship-owners strongly objected to the passing tolls; they said they would sooner have no harbours of refuge at all than be liable to passing tolls. It was said in reply that harbours of refuge were a great advantage to shipowners, because the premiums of insurance would be diminished by the security of the coasts; but it was found by reference to the harbours already made, Holyhead, Kingston and Portland, that although they were much resorted to by vessels in stress of weather, their construction had not had the least effect in diminishing the premiums of insurance. Another objection to passing tolls was, that ships well found and properly loaded would keep the sea, and that only inferior ships, ill found and overloaded, would use these harbours, and that therefore the owners of the best ships would be taxed for those who sent the worst vessels to sea. In looking at this question, then, it should be considered that these harbours, if made, must be made by public money. It would be uneconomical to construct such works gradually; the best economy was to proceed with them rapidly. There was always a good deal of difficulty in fixing on the best site for such works. Then, he supposed, the harbours, when made, must not be left unoccupied or undefended. They must have some fortifications. From his experience of works constructed under water, he should say the expenditure on these harbours would be largely in excess of £4,000,000. The noble Lord had limited himself, in his observations, chiefly to the north-east coast of England, as being the district where most of the wrecks took place, and a harbour of refuge was most required; but the returns did not show this to be the case. He had before him a return of the wrecks which had taken place on the coast during the last twelve years, divided into districts, and he found that from the Fern Islands to Flamborough Head the total loss of life was 620; from Flamborough Head to the North Foreland, 1,068; but taking the other side, from the Skerries to the Mull of Kintyre, the loss of life was 1,597—a much larger loss than that which had occurred on the north-east coast. We had now been for many years engaged, and at great expense, in making certain harbours—Portland, Holyhead, the pier at Dover, and the harbour at Alderney. He was happy to say those great works, constructed at the public charge, were now drawing to a close. Portland would be finished by December, 1865. Alderney would be completed in 1864, unless some new scheme were added to the works. Holyhead was also in a fair way to be completed. He was very unwilling that Parliament should involve itself in fresh expenditure on account of works of that character until these great works were completed. There was another consideration, to which, indeed, the noble Lord had alluded. Portland had been a very convenient place for the employment of convict labour. Quarrying and moving stones was a species of employment very fit for large numbers of convicts. It was healthy work, and required little skilled labour; while those who were engaged in it for a lengthened period had learned sufficient of stonework to enable them on their discharge to earn by similar employment the means of livelihood. He believed that great economy had resulted from the employment of convict labour at Portland, although he was quite aware that many persons took a different view, and thought the work might have been done quite as cheaply, and perhaps more rapidly, without any convict labour whatever. The only mode in which he felt it would be desirable for the country to undertake the construction of a large harbour of refuge would be by having recourse to such a species of labour. The noble Lord had referred to the Vote of the House of Commons and the recommendations of the Royal Commission, and had intimated that nothing had been done in pursuance of them. But something had been really accomplished which was not unimportant. One of those recommendations was that trading harbours should be made by means of loans, to be obtained from the Public Loan Commissioners. Well, a Bill had been brought in on the footing of that arrangement, and under it about half a million of money had been raised. Therefore, it was incorrect to say that nothing had been done. On the contrary, he had a list of the places which had already borrowed considerable sums under that measure. Among them were Falmouth, the Tyne, the Wear, and others; and at present a large number more had applied to the Public Loan Commissioners, and their applications were still under consideration with a view to determine the conditions on which they should be acceded to. Therefore, not only were harbours in course of construction at the places he had enumerated, but a great many others would in a short time be in process of formation under that recommendation; and he thought it was of great advantage to the country that these works should be executed rather by local exertions than by the public. If the national funds were to be devoted to such a purpose, there would be a scramble on the part of different places to get the largest share. It would, he believed, be a great mistake so to follow out the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners as to make a great many harbours along the coast at the public expense. He did not think that such a saving of life and property as some persons anticipated would be effected by these harbours. All the evidence taken on the subject showed, that on the contrary, they would lead to persons continuing to employ very unseaworthy and badly-found ships. In the coal trade old tubs were sent to sea that were fit for nothing. Their owners insured them, and when the insurance covered the risk, they cared little what befell them. Such a thing as a worn-out ship being broken up was hardly known, the vessels being used until they some day went to the bottom; and in that way the lives of crews were sacrificed. He had now stated generally the views entertained by the Government on this question, and shown, he thought, that the subject had not been entirely neglected. Although they had not gone the length which the Commissioners had recommended, they had yet endeavoured, as far as possible, to assist private enterprise in the construction of trading harbours without increasing the taxation borne by the public. He was not prepared to say that it might not be desirable to try the experiment of convict labour further in the making of a large harbour. His own opinion, he confessed, had always inclined that way. But the matter involved many important considerations. A Commission was now engaged in investigating the treatment of convicts. He did not know whether this particular point would be included in their inquiries; but, at all events, he thought it was one well deserving of attention.

LORD RAVENSWORTH had heard with surprise that the loss of life was greatest on the west coast of Scotland; for there was on that coast no trade at all. The sufferers must, therefore, be almost exclusively fishermen. A glance at the wreck chart would show that the greatest number of disasters to ships occurred between the Humber and the Tyne; and he trusted that the Government would not be disinclined to consider favourably the claims of those parts of the coast which were so much exposed.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, the figures he had quoted came from official returns, and he believed that they were true. It was melancholy to think of these spirited fishermen being thus lost; but he was glad to say that the harbour at Wick was in course of improvement.

RETURN PRESENTED—CASE OF THE CONVICT GILBERT.

Return Convicts (Tickets of Leave) delivered (pursuant to Address of 4th of August last).—(Parl. P. 6.)

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he would remind the noble Earl the Lord President that before the close of the last Session he had asked for the production of any papers that might exist with reference to the grant of a ticket of leave to the convict Gilbert, who afterwards committed rape upon and murdered a young woman named Hall, at Fordingbridge. It appeared that Gilbert had none of the endearing manners which were supposed sometimes to prevail upon gaol chaplains and other persons to procure the remission of prisoners' sentences. On the contrary, he was known in the village to which he belonged as a sullen, ferocious and brutal man. The Government had not yet been able to furnish the information for which he had asked last year as to the circumstances under which Gilbert obtained his release from his original term of punishment, but he trusted they would be good enough to procure it.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, he also wished to repeat his Question relative to the convict Redpath, who was sentenced in 1857 to transportation for life. He desired to know, whether Redpath was at large upon a ticket of leave either in this country or in Australia; and also, whether, if he was at large in the colony, the terms of his release were such as would enable him to return home?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that he would make inquiries in reference to the Question of the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury); and as to the second Question, he might say that Redpath, having been convicted in 1857, was in 1858 transported to Western Australia. Some time afterwards rumours reached this country that he was at large, and thereupon the Home Office made inquiries upon the subject, and the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle) sent to the colony to make inquiries there, but had not yet received an answer. He might, however, observe, that as to Redpath's return to this country, that was not possible unless he first obtained a pardon from the Crown.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE stated that Redpath was released, not contrary to existing regulations, but in virtue of new regulations established four or five years ago in the Colonies. Under the rules existing at the time he was transported, he would not have been entitled to a ticket of leave until the present year. Some years ago, however, on the recommendation of the Governor of the Colony, sanctioned by Sir Edward Bulwer-Lytton, a system of marks was introduced, and under that system Redpath obtained his release about two years sooner than he would have procured it under the old regulation. By good conduct he acquired a number of marks which entitled him to be set at liberty in 1861. He understood that an attempt had been made to charge Sir George Grey with carelessness in connection with this case. The truth was that Sir George, as Home Secretary, had nothing to do with it, except this—when Redpath applied for advantages additional to those conferred upon him by his ticket of leave, he (the Duke of Newcastle) referred to the Home Office. Sir George Grey, so far from acceding to Redpath's request, asked how he had obtained his release, and it was that question from the Home Secretary which led to all the inquiry into the case.

THE EARL OF DERBY was anxious to know the utmost degree to which the leave extended. He understood that a ticket of leave in Western Australia was a very different thing from a ticket of leave in England. A ticket-of-leave man in Western Australia was not lost sight of by the authorities; on the contrary, he was kept under the strictest surveillance and employed upon public works. It would not be far wrong to say, in fact, that an Australian ticket of leave was the second stage of penal discipline.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, it was quite true that a ticket of leave in Western Australia was not the same thing as a ticket of leave in England; but the person holding it was not employed on public works. When a convict received a ticket of leave in Western Australia, if he were the servant of any other person in the colony, he could not quit his master's house after ten o'clock at night, while, if he were in a position to have a house of his own, he was not entitled to leave it after the same hour, and he was under the surveillance of the police of the district. Redpath, he believed, resided in his own house, receiving through the Australian

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, February 12, 1863.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED.—For Devizes, v. John Neilson Gladstone, esquire, deceased.
SELECT COMMITTEES.—Standing Orders, nominated; Committee of Selection, nominated.
Report.—Public Petitions (First Report).
PUBLIC BILLS.—1st—Union Relief Aid Act (1862) Continuance [Bill 17]; Telegraphs [Bill 16].
2nd—Illegitimate Children (Ireland) [Bill 13].
Committee.—Drainage of Land (Ireland).

SELECT COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS—FEES ON PRIVATE BILLS. QUESTION.

On the Motion of Colonel WILSON PATTEN, the Select Committee on Standing Orders nominated, as follow:—Colonel WILSON PATTEN, Mr. WALPOLE, Mr. HENLEY, Mr. WRIGHTSON, Mr. HERBERT, Mr. BRAMSTON, Mr. BONHAM-CARTER, Mr. LEFROY, Mr. DUNLOP, Mr. PULLER, and Mr. EDWARD EGERTON.

MR. HODGSON begged to ask the hon. and gallant Member, Whether it was his intention to move the re-appointment of the Committee which sat last Session upon the subject of the fees paid to the House on Private Bills; the House, however, having separated without having come to any conclusion on the subject. The amount of fees paid by the promoters of Private Bills in that House was so enormous that it was perfectly scandalous. It was more than sufficient to pay the whole expenses of the House of Commons' establishment connected with Public as well as Private Bills. The charge for the establishment was about £50,000 a year, and for many years the amount of fees exceeded that sum. In one year, 1845, the fees amounted to £220,000, and two years ago it was £70,000, allowing a considerable surplus to be handed over to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It appeared extremely unfair that the promoters of Private Bills should pay for the whole expense of the public establishment. It was quite right that they should pay towards printing Local and Personal Acts, and for the clerks and attendants on the committee-rooms, but the fees ought not to exceed the amount of those legitimate expenses. This was a matter which required immediate attention, so that an alteration should take place for the benefit of the promoters of Bills in the present Session. The Committee which was appointed last year had no authority to refer to the enormous fees allowed to be taken by solicitors and Parliamentary agents with respect to Private Bills. He would only mention one fact, as a proof that that matter also required consideration. When two or three copies of the minutes of evidence were supplied, the cost did not exceed 2d. per folio; yet for the mere mechanical lithographing of the shorthand writers' notes solicitors were allowed to charge 8d. per folio, and he had known many cases where the expense of the minutes of evidence amounted to £150 a day for several weeks, during which time the Committee sat. If nothing were done in any other quarter, he hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would take some steps to relieve the promoters of Private Bills from such heavy charges.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he had called attention to the subject last Session, and moved the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the subject of the fees paid by the promoters of Private Bills; and that Committee recommended that the subject should in the present Session be again taken into consideration. It was perfectly true that the fees upon Private Bills in that House were very large, but they formed a very small portion of the enormous expenditure to which parties seeking Private Bills were subjected. The general expense of private legislation was now so great that public attention had been roused, and a general impression prevailed that the matter ought to be considered. That being the prevalent opinion, and being not unmindful of the recommendations of the Committee, it was his intention to move the re-appointment of the Committee if the matter were not taken up in another quarter. But he had been in communication with Her Majesty's Government, was not without hopes that they evote their attention to the whole with a view to establishing a better and abolishing the present enormous expenses. The matter was well worthy the attention of Her Majesty's Government, and should they fail to take it up, he would certainly move the appointment of a Committee to consider the whole subject, which was left imperfect by the Committee of last Session.

Afterwards,

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, at the early part of the evening he had been asked a Question, whether he intended to move for the re-appointment of the Committee of last Session to inquire into the fees and expenses attendant upon private legislation? The answer he gave was, that his action on that subject would depend upon the course the Government took. He now wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it was his intention to introduce a Bill with a view to the reduction of the expenses connected with private legislation?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that when the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) moved for leave to bring in a Bill having reference to the expense of Private Bills, he (Mr. Milner Gibson) stated, on the part of the Government, their opinion that an important change, such as that contemplated by the Bill ought not to be agreed to by the House without a preliminary inquiry. In accordance with that view he proposed, having conferred with the Members of the Government, to move for such a Committee as that referred to by the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Wilson Patten). He hoped the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) would not proceed with the second reading of his Bill, should the House consent to appoint a Committee to inquire into the subject, but allow it to stand over until that Committee had completed its inquiry. The order of reference would, of course, include the object of the hon. and gallant Gentleman—the resumption of the inquiry of last Session. He would give notice either that night or to-morrow of the Motion for the appointment of the Committee.

NOMINATION.

Committee of Selection nominated as follow:—Mr. DUNLOP, Mr. HERBERT, Mr. BONHAM-CARTER, Lord HOTHAM, Mr. MOWBRAY, and the Chairman of the Select Committees on Standing Orders.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in consequence of the repeated recurrence of railway accidents, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce, during the present Session, any measure founded on the Report of the Committee on Railway Accidents, which was laid upon the table of the House in the year 1858?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, nothing had occurred during the last year which, in the opinion of the Board of Trade, rendered it expedient to legislate for the management of railways, or to interfere by legislation for the prevention of accidents. The accidents which had occurred during the last year to passenger trains had been somewhat fewer than in the year which preceded it. Taking both years, he found that there was a decrease of 48 per cent in the number of persons killed in consequence of accidents to passenger trains in 1862 as compared with 1861; while there was a diminution of 34 per cent in the number of persons injured. The exact figures were these—the accidents to passenger trains in 1861 were 56, the number of passengers killed in consequence 46, and the number injured 780. It should, however, be borne in mind that the number carried by passenger trains during that period amounted to 173,721,139 persons; so that there was only 1 passenger killed in every 3,760,000, and 1 injured in every 220,000 conveyed. In 1862 the number of accidents were 51, or 9 per cent less than in the previous year, there being 24 passengers killed and 509 injured. The traffic returns not having been made up for 1862, he could not make a comparison between the number of persons killed and injured and the entire number conveyed by train; but the contrast would, he thought, be found to be even more favourable this year to the last, taking into account the new lines which had been opened and the probably increased number of passengers conveyed. Under these circumstances there was, in his opinion, no increased necessity for the interference of Parliament on the subject.

DELHI PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SMYTH asked the Secretary of State for War, The cause of the delay in the payment of prize money for the capture of Delhi to the troops engaged in that service?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had no official control over the distribution of Indian prize money, and perhaps the hon. and gallant Member would put his question to the Secretary of State for India, to whose department the matter exclusively belonged.

COURTS OF LAW COMMISSION (ENGLAND AND IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. LONGFIELD asked Mr. Attorney General, When it is likely that the English and Irish Courts of Law and Chancery Commissioners will make their Report, and what has caused the delay in their doing so?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would admit that some considerable time had elapsed since the appointment of the Commission without any Report having been made; but this, he thought, might be easily accounted for, and that it involved no imputation on the Commissioners. The causes were the nature and extent of the inquiry, and the character and employments of the Commissioners. These gentlemen were judges and barristers of large practice, some of whom lived in England and some in Ireland, and it was only at one period of the year that meetings could be conveniently arranged. He might say, however, that great progress had been made and a large amount of matter accumulated for the Report. He had not had an opportunity of communicating with the other Commissioners as to the time when the Report would be ready.

ARMY PROMOTION.—QUESTION.

GENERAL LINDSAY asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is true, as reported in a Military Journal, that he has recently decided to make no alteration either in the position or in the prospects of the Officers promoted to the rank of Colonel for Distinguished Service in the Field during the Crimean War, and who have been deprived of their relative rotation in the list through the action of the Warrant of 1858.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that one of the last acts of his predecessor at the War Office had been to appoint a Committee to inquire into the subject to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman's question related. On that Committee were Lieutenant General Yorke, Major General Daltzell, Major General Eyre, and Major General Croften, as well as the hon. and gallant General (General Lindsay) himself. The Committee thus constituted agreed to a Report, which was dated the 25th of July, 1861, and in that Report occurred the following paragraph:—

“The more we investigate the subject the more we feel convinced that to disturb the present order of the Colonels' list in favour of the officers in question would be unjust to others who are no less deserving of consideration, and would give rise to renewed confusion, while the general effect of such a proceeding upon the officers of the army would be to shake their confidence in the permanency of any existing system, and in the security of their own positions.”

The hon. and gallant Officer opposite, it was true, dissented from that paragraph, and made a separate Report; but he himself (Sir George Lewis) after having given the subject the most attentive consideration, had arrived at the conclusion that it would be impossible to disturb the decision at which his predecessors had arrived.

TICKET-OF-LEAVE PRISONERS.

QUESTION.

MR. BUTLER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When it will be convenient to present to the House the Return ordered by the House on the 3rd of July, 1862, relative to Ticket-of-Leave Prisoners; and whether he will object to lay upon the table a list of the cases in which the conditions of the Ticket of Leave had been dispensed with, and the grounds for dispensing with such conditions; also, whether the convict Redpath is at large under the licence of a Ticket of Leave; if, so, under what circumstances, and whether he can, with the permission of the colonial authorities, return to this country?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Return referred to by the hon. Gentleman was either on the table at that moment or would be in the course of the evening. As to the second part of the Question, he presumed the hon. Gentleman referred to the cases of ticket of leave holders a second time convicted, whose tickets had not been revoked. These persons were comprised in two classes—one in which the revocation had not been made because the sentence of imprisonment on the ticket of leave holder for his second conviction would not expire until so near the expiration of his original sentence that it was not thought worth while to remove him from the district or county prison to Milbank or Portland, or some other convict prison from which he must be again almost immediately released. The second class comprised very few, whose second offences were of so trifling a character that their tickets had not been revoked. With regard to the convict Redpath, his was not a sentence of penal servitude. He was sentenced in 1857 to transportation for life, and was sent to Western Australia in August, 1858. He (Sir George Grey) believed that the attention of the then Home Secretary was not drawn to the fact that Redpath was among those embarked. It recently came to his (Sir George Grey's) knowledge that Redpath had received a ticket of leave under the colonial regulations. That of course he could not have received as yet if he had been under sentence of penal servitude in this country. As Redpath was sentenced to transportation for life, he could not return to this country unless he received a free pardon from the Crown, which it was very unlikely would be the case.

BRAZIL—QUESTION.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to put a question to the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs with reference to the Brazilian Papers which he had promised should be laid on the table. As the hon. Gentleman was no doubt aware, the communications that had passed between Mr. Christie and the Brazilian Government had been published in extenso by the Brazilian Government, had come to this country by the last mail, and were now in the hands of many Members of that House and of people out of doors. He wished to know, When the House might expect that those papers would be formally laid upon the table; and also if the hon. Gentleman was aware that the Brazilian Government had instructed their Envoy in this country to make a demand on Her Majesty's Government for reparation? He was desirous of knowing whether the papers to be presented to Parliament would contain the communications that passed between the Brazilian Minister and Her Majesty's Government up to the latest date?

MR. LAYARD said, no time would be lost in preparing the papers referred to; but there were so many to be printed within the last few days it was difficult to complete them. The papers would contain the whole of the Correspondence on the subject up to the last moment.

INDIA—MEMORANDUM OF DINKER
RAO.—QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether there is any objection to call upon the Government of India to furnish him with a copy of a Memorandum of Observations on the administration of India, presented to Lord Canning before his departure by Dinker Rao, Member of Council?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he could not undertake to lay on the table a paper of the existence of which he was not aware. He had seen a reference to it, but further than that he knew nothing about it.

BILL—[BILL 13.]

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the Bill the second reading of which he was about to move had nothing more for its object than to give an interpretation to a clause enacted by the Commons in the Irish Poor Law Act of last Session. In the House of Lords an Amendment was made which entirely altered the sense of the clause as it was passed by the House of Commons. The case was this:—A Committee which sat on Poor Law Relief in Ireland, in 1861, reported that there was no law of affiliation in that country, and they recommended that the law of Ireland should be made identical with that of England. An Amendment to that effect was proposed in Committee by his noble Friend the Member for Mayo, (Lord John Browne) and it was adopted. It consequently became imperative upon the Government to introduce a Bill upon the subject, and he (Sir Robert Peel) did introduce a Bill for the purpose of enacting that the law should be assimilated to that of England; but when it was presented to the House, it was not satisfactory to the majority of Irish Members, on the ground that it was not suitable to the condition of that country, and he was obliged to withdraw it. During the passing of the Poor Law Bill his noble Friend the Member for Mayo proposed that the Chairmen of Counties—that was to say, the assistant barristers—should be the persons to whom the boards of guardians should refer cases for the purpose of recovering the amounts which had been expended in the relief of the mothers and of their bastard children, and the House on a division carried the Amendment by 111 to 11; consequently the House of Commons clearly sanctioned that arrangement. During the passing of the Bill through the House of Lords, an Amendment was carried, which distinctly changed the proposal of the House of Commons, and it then became necessary to consider the question in a different light. The clause which was passed in the other House was so badly drawn that it was impossible to act uniformly under it. Two Chairmen, those of Mayo and the King's County, considered that justices in petty sessions were entitled to adjudicate upon the subject, whereas the Law Officers of the Crown thought it was the duty of the assistant barristers to do so. That no doubt was the intention of the House of Commons, and therefore to give a clear and proper interpretation to the clause this Bill had been introduced, and he presumed there would be no objection to it.

MR. HENNESSY said, the right hon. Baronet had truly stated that he could not pass his Bill of last Session owing to the opposition of the Irish Members; but he now wanted to pass that Bill under a new form. This measure was, in fact, the small end of the wedge. It was stated as a fact by Englishmen that the Irish women were more moral than the women of England, owing, as they believed, to the absence of a bastardy law in Ireland, which they considered gave encouragement to illegitimacy in this country. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the claims under the Bill of last Session fell to the ground, the magistrates not believing the evidence. Such a scene of perjury was never before witnessed in Ireland; and passing this Bill would increase that perjury and encourage the immorality to which the Bill was applicable, as such immorality had been encouraged in England by similar legislation. He would be happy to support any hon. Member who would move the rejection of the Bill.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he believed the Bill to be one of great public utility, and that it ought to be read a second time; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would meet those who objected to particular clauses in a spirit of fairness in Committee.

MR. GEORGE said, the Members who sat upon the Select Committee had reason to be obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the steps which he had taken to carry out their recommendations. Proceedings before the Chairmen of counties, were, however, attended with considerable expense and delay, and he thought it desirable that the requisite powers should be given to magistrates enabling them to adjudicate.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^d, and committed for Monday next.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Mr. C. P. VILLIERS, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to extend for a further period the provisions of the Union Relief Aid Act of the last Session, said, the measure which he desired to introduce had for its object to continue the operation of the Act that was passed last Session for the purpose of better enabling Boards of Guardians in certain Unions to meet the very serious charge for the relief of the poor which was occasioned by the war in America, and which, by precluding us from the use of the raw material of cotton, had rendered nearly half a million of our fellow-subjects destitute. The Act to which he referred was, as the House would probably remember, introduced under some apprehension that under the ordinary operation of the Poor Law the means would be inadequate for relieving the distress, which was expected to increase. The resource in all cases of distress in this country was the property of the district where the poor were settled, or from which they could not be removed—a resource which had generally been available for its purpose; but in this instance fears for its adequacy had been felt. It was not alleged in this case that the great manufacturing counties in which this distress prevailed were unable or unwilling to discharge their liability to maintain their poor. That was not alleged on the part of those who represented the interests of Lancashire; on the contrary, if he rightly remembered, they emphatically declared that it was the desire of proprietors and occupiers of property in Lancashire to maintain the poor that might be cast upon the rates upon this occasion; and he believed also that it was the opinion throughout the House that it was desirable not to depart from the ancient policy of imposing local liability to meet local wants, and that the administration of relief should be left in local hands. There were, he believed, some opinions entertained by individuals that the poor of Lancashire should be charged on the Consolidated Fund; but that proposition had never received any form or shape capable of being submitted to the House, and he did not think it had ever been put forward in a manner to command attention. What he understood the demand to have been when this matter was brought before the House, was that there should be some amendment or modification of the Poor Law as it existed, to render the guardians sure of possessing the means of relieving that vast amount of distress that was unfortunately then increasing, and, if possible, to mitigate in some way the pressure upon those who were liable, by law, for the payment of rates. The House would remember that this subject received considerable attention last Session, and that much observation was made upon the scale of rating for the poor in Lancashire. It was much observed that the rating was extremely low, and that in comparison with the rating in other parts of the country it seemed to be far below what was known to exist almost as the normal state of rating, and which would not probably be exceeded when the distress was greatest in Lancashire. It was, indeed, admitted as a fact that the rating in Lancashire was very low, and the property was very large, and that there were many places in this country where for many years past the rates had been much higher. But it was said then, and with great truth, that it was hardly then a fair criterion of the condition of the people in these districts to take any rate in the pound which might have been levied in past times for the support of their poor. Those districts were peculiar; they were unlike many other manufacturing districts where other kinds of business were conducted, and where there was a greater variety of property; unlike great and populous towns that are not dependent on manufactures, but have large numbers of poor to maintain. The peculiarity of what were called the cotton districts, was that they had sprung up and grown up with the cotton trade itself; and the state of those districts, altogether, whether as regarded the condition of the people or the value of the property, varied almost directly with the state of the cotton trade. It would be quite possible at one time to observe those districts prosperous, displaying wealth and capacity to bear burdens beyond almost any others in the country, and very shortly afterwards to see the same districts suffering, almost prostrate, and incapable beyond other places to meet the charges which ordinarily attached to property. The result was, that people might see a very large estimate of the rateable property in those districts, and imagine that there was vast wealth there in proportion to the population; but whenever the trade became very much depressed and stagnant, a large proportion of this property became unavailable for rating and in some cases utterly valueless; and the fear was that by rigorously enforcing the law in collecting the rate many of the former rate-payers there might be forced into the ranks of the destitute, and the distress thereby be aggravated and increased. Any one, also, acquainted with these districts was aware that they had this peculiarity, that the proportion of the operative population to any other class was much greater there than in other places. In passing through the districts one could see almost miles of dwelling-houses which, from their appearance, must be occupied by operatives, with hardly any other buildings visible, but those of the mills where they worked; while the large and straggling suburbs which surrounded the older towns in Lancashire presented the same aspect. He believed that in those places there was hardly any intermediate class between the masters and the workmen, unless, indeed, they were the shop-keepers, who were the tradesmen of the operatives. It consequently was a necessary result, that when the trade was depressed, there was an enormous number of people requiring relief, and at the time when the burden of that relief was the heaviest, those who had to bear it were then the least competent to do so. Therefore, it seemed hardly fair to judge of the capacity of those districts to support a very heavy charge of burden for the poor, simply because in good times a large estimate of the property had been made, or to assume in consequence that the property would be equally available when a great burden fell upon it. Consequently, it had appeared to him a reasonable demand made upon this House, supported as it was by those who represented the interests of Lancashire, that there should be some means taken under the peculiar circumstances to ensure the guardians having the means necessary for relief, and some measure adopted by which the rate-payers might for the time be spared the whole weight of the burden legally cast upon them. He had already mentioned the characteristics of the districts—depressed one day, and in the highest state of prosperity the next; and to prevent the unnecessary sacrifice of property, and the disorganization of capital and labour, it was desirable to devise a measure by which the temporary pressure might be alleviated. He was invited, therefore, to propose such an amendment of the Poor Law Act as would meet the exigencies of the case. On this occasion two suggestions were made, which seemed well adapted to meet what was required for the purpose. One was to give practical effect to the old principle and policy of the Poor Law of this country—namely, that when any townships or parishes became burdened in excess for the support of their poor, they were entitled to call upon the neighbouring divisions of the county for relief. This provision was quite as much part of the Poor Law of England as that which cast on any particular district the charge for what was called its own poor. This was a provision of the old law that had been held sacred for nearly three centuries, and at the time of the great revision of the Poor Law system, in 1833, that section of the Act of Elizabeth was carefully retained. Therefore there was no novelty in that proposition, so far as the principle was concerned, and it seemed, at the same time, to meet the circumstances of those districts. The only difficulty arose out of the new division of the country into unions for the relief of the poor, and legislation became necessary in consequence, to give effect to the original provision. A clause for this purpose, therefore, was provided, which in consistency with the ancient principle, has been rendered easy in operation, and appears to provide an appropriate remedy for the evil contemplated. One leading feature, therefore, of this Bill was to give power to any union in those districts which felt burdened in excess to call on other unions to contribute in proportion to their property in aid of their distress. There was another provision in this Bill, which appeared more simple, and which seemed indeed to be more popular—namely, that unions, when they felt the charge on property to be excessive, and when this should have reached a certain point, should have the power, with the sanction of the Poor Law Board, to borrow whatever sum might be needed to meet the excess. The Bill only contained those two provisions to meet the requirements of the occasion; and though it seemed difficult at first to determine on the amendment of the Poor Law that would meet the object in view, he believed that it would have been almost impossible to devise a measure which more aptly suited the purpose and the circumstances of the people than the measure he had proposed. No one could say that on account of the borrowing power there was danger of the guardians being lavish in their expenditure, because their object would, of course, be never to reach the limit after which they would be entitled to borrow; and, as guardians were notoriously averse to borrowing when it was certain they must repay the money, that House fixed a limited period within which the borrowed money was to be repaid by annual instalments. Thus the guardians had the means of raising the money they required, and the ratepayers, relieved for a time, had a guarantee that the guardians would act with prudence. Looking at the great wealth which did exist in Lancashire and Cheshire, and feeling that that wealth had been enormously increased by the contiguity of the property to the districts engaged in the cotton trade, it was felt that there was an equity in calling on property which, though not exactly situated in the cotton districts, had yet been enhanced in value by its contiguity to those places, to contribute towards the relief of the distress. He believed that after the Act passed no proprietor regretted having given it his support, and the measure seemed to find favour in the country. He had been astonished to learn that one of the Members for Southwark (Mr. Locke) had stated the other night that the Act had been applied in only two instances, and, that in fact, it might be regarded as inoperative. His hon. and learned Friend had made a mistake in that respect. Not less than twelve most distressed unions were in a condition to avail themselves of the Act. Seven had done so already; five of them had borrowed money, and four had borrowed money and had called upon the county beside. He had learned that there had been no difficulty whatever in applying the Act. The forms were very simple; the accounts were prepared and were examined by the Inspector sent from the Poor Law Board to see that they were correctly made out; and on the order being given by the Poor Law Board the money was raised. The security was, doubtless, thought good, because all the money raised by these unions had been obtained at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. He understood that no objection on principle had been made by the unions called on to contribute in aid. Several had already paid their quota; and where objections had been expressed those objections were not against the principle of the rate in aid, but had reference merely to some technical point, such as that Chester was a county of itself, and that the distressed unions were in Lancashire and not in Cheshire. No strong objections had yet reached him to the principle of the measure, and he believed he might add that nothing had yet happened to alarm the counties with regard to contributions, either made already, or that might be required by the continuance of the Bill. The contribution in Derbyshire was not more than one farthing, in Cheshire not more than one penny, and in Lancashire only three farthings. He had taken some pains to ascertain how this Act was viewed by boards of guardians in the distressed districts, and he found that it was generally considered to be a very valuable resource to which they might recur in case of need; that nearly all considered it must, or ought to be continued, and that there was no question with regard to the policy of borrowing, although some objections were urged by some individuals against claiming relief from the county at all. Those who thought that the Act had not been operative to the extent which might have been expected might be reminded of the obvious reason for that, which was the very large contributions which had been made, he might say, from all parts of Her Majesty's dominions. Those contributions were not anticipated when the Bill was passed. They had been marvellous—they had been most munificent—and he believed he was in a position to state, that notwithstanding the enormous number who had been recipients of relief during the last six months, amounting to 500,000, more than half had been relieved by voluntary contributions. They might judge from that of what importance the Bill would have been, but for those contributions. Those contributions having been so large, and been flowing in constantly hitherto, must, he was afraid, be about to diminish; and if so, that made it more necessary that a Bill of this kind should continue, as its operation was now perhaps becoming more important than it had yet been before. Those contributions, he believed, had been very much stimulated by that which might have been expected, but of which they could hardly have been sure previously; namely, the admirable patience and forbearance and, he might almost say, the patriotism of the poor people themselves in the manner in which they had borne their sufferings. And he believed that he might add that many subscriptions had been also contributed from the donors witnessing the intelligence, economy, and judgment displayed by those persons on the spot who had so nobly and generously devoted their time to the administration of the vast funds placed at their disposal. He would just show to the House what amounts had been borrowed hitherto under the Act in order that they might judge of the importance of the Bill and that they might have some idea of what would be required in future. For expenditure which occurred before Michaelmas and after Midsummer, Preston borrowed £3,890, and Blackburn £3,517, making a total of £7,407. For the expenditure during the Christmas quarter Ashton borrowed £8,037; Blackburn, £10,000; Glossop, £1,200; Haslingden, £3,063; Preston, £7,316; Rochdale, £5,887; Todmorden, £1,186; total, £36,689. Added to that there was charged to the counties, for Ashton, £8,097; Glossop, £1,718; Haslingden, £2,193; and Preston, £7,571, in all, £19,579, making a total borrowed and charged on counties of £63,675. This, indeed, added to the large contributions, would give them a sad idea of the extent of the necessities of these districts. He was afraid, that although trade was somewhat reviving, the distress was still considerable, and that it would be a long time before they could hope that there would not be what at any other time would be considered an enormous number of persons living on charity. For instance, since the Bill passed there were 160,000 more persons receiving relief than there were at that time, and he believed the charge weekly made exceeded by £20,000 a week what was then paid for their relief. He had besides the answers from twelve of the principal unions, all expressing a wish that the Act should be renewed. Preston was the most distressed union, and immediately a question was raised as to the value of the Act, Mr. Ascroft, the Chairman of the Preston Board of Guardians, wrote to Mr. Farnall to state that in his opinion the provisions were most valuable, and that in Preston they would be able to do with a 2s. 6d. rate up to March, whereas, but for the Act, they would have required at least a rate of 5s. One union had presented a petition against the Bill, but in that union the number of poor was so small that they would not benefit by it, and might have to contribute to others, and with that exception he was not aware that any union had expressed a desire that the Bill should not be renewed. He had put forward this Bill, as he had stated, merely as a mode of meeting an evil which existed, or at least to prevent the evil of undue pressure of rates extending, of which there was great apprehension. He did not propose the Bill last year as striking at all at the cause of the distress. He was perfectly aware that the interruption of trade with the United States was the real cause, which was a matter far too deep for a Bill of this kind to reach. It was not his province at this time to express any opinion upon the prospect of a termination of the terrible depression of trade in those counties. It might be a subject of discussion as they advanced further in the Session, but he had only to state to-night what he conceived to be the reasons for renewing the Bill, and which he trusted the House would deem sufficient. He could only say that the Government were perfectly alive to the evils which at present existed. They were perfectly well aware of the enormous danger of a vast mass of the population remaining unemployed, and they knew what distressing sacrifices of property were daily made owing to this state of things. Those matters might be deserving of the special consideration of the House. The Government did not underrate the distress which existed or the evils to be overcome. He proposed this Bill for the purpose which he had stated. He had not the least reason for supposing that the powers conferred on the guardians would be in any way abused. He had the authority of Mr. Farnall, who was perhaps better acquainted with the opinions and views of the cotton district than any other person, for saying that there was the most anxious solicitude on the part of the guardians and those who were engaged in distributing voluntary relief to find independent employment, and to prevent anything which might tend to demoralize the people. He had not therefore the smallest hesitation in asking the House to extend the powers of the present Act for the term of one twelvemonth. There was not the smallest indication that there would be an end of the distress in a year. If there was, the Bill would be inoperative. If there was not, there would be no necessity to trouble the House with a reconsideration of the renewal of the measure in the present Session. He therefore proposed that the Act of last Session should be continued until Lady-day, 1864. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he had listened carefully to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and he thought there was no doubt a case had been made out for a renewal of this Bill—whether for a year or any other period might be hereafter discussed. But he thought the right hon. Gentleman laboured under some misapprehension when he said he believed the Act as it now stood gave entire satisfaction to all the unions which he had mentioned. Representations of a different nature had been made to him, and he had been requested by outlying unions to ask for one or two alterations which they deemed necessary. He would not enter upon those matters until the proper stage, but he should then call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to them, and he hoped he should have an opportunity of discussing some of them in private before that time. The chief pleasure which he had derived from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was that it afforded ample justification for the course which was taken last Session by several Gentlemen connected with the manufacturing districts when they urged the Government to take steps to meet the awful calamity which they believed was about to fall on this country. If, in the present state of circumstances, which, in some respects, had altered rather for the better, the Government thought fit to bring in the self-same Bill and to afford the self-same relief, it was a conclusive proof that those Members were right in suggesting the measure at a former period when things were a more gloomy aspect, and when they could not have anticipated the enormous amounts which had been received from the munificence of this and other countries. At the time the measure was brought forward in the last Session the Members representing the cotton districts were taken to task by Members for southern constituencies because they were applying for these powers when they were so much more favourably situated as to rates than other parts of the kingdom. He recollected that an hon.

Friend of his in that House last year asked him why the locality in which he resided should be called upon to come to the aid of the manufacturing districts, observing that the poor rate in that locality was as high as 4s. 6d. in the pound, while in several parishes in Lancashire it was only 1s. 6d. But the answer to that way of putting the question was that a normal rate of 4s. 6d., subject to which bargains were made, and which in reality fell on the landlord, was not to be compared with a rate smaller in amount, but suddenly increased to meet an emergency—the increase being paid not by the owner, but by the occupier. A man, for instance, went into Lancashire and took a house, the poor rate being only 1s. 6d. in the pound, and for him it was a very serious thing indeed when he unexpectedly found himself called upon to pay 11s. 6d. Such was the difference between the circumstances of the manufacturing and the other districts throughout the country. Now, if the House would allow, he would mention a few instances of the operation of the distress in Lancashire in the augmentation of the rates. Take for instance the town of Todmorden, and there the rate which was formerly 11d. in the pound, was raised on the 22nd of November to 6s. 4½d. seven times more of a rate than the occupier had to pay previously. In Stockport the ratepayers had been called upon to pay nine times, in Rochdale nine, in Preston seven and a half, in Oldham ten, in Manchester six, in Glossop nineteen, in Bury six, in Burnley six, and in Ashton-under-Lyne nineteen and a half times the original rate. It should not be forgotten that a very large portion of the rate-paying class were at the very moment that they were called upon to pay those rates deprived of the very means of paying them. The consequence was that a great number of people were brought to utter ruin. In Oldham alone—the hon. Member for that borough would correct him if wrong—the effect of the increased rates was to change the condition of 2,000 of its inhabitants from ratepayers to that of recipients of aid from that source. [An hon. MEMBER: "4,000."] That, however, was not the whole history of the pressure which had been put upon the small ratepayers and shopkeepers, because, in many cases, time for the payment of the rate was granted, while some were excused from paying it on the ground of inability. He wished he could see a Return setting forth the number of ratepayers in Lancashire who during the last six months had been excused payment; the number who had become recipients of relief; and those who from inability to pay had been excused or allowed time to pay them. Such a Return, he believed, would show a very disastrous state of affairs. There was another very large class of ratepayers who did not come under any of those three heads. The object contemplated in the present measure was not so much to relieve the operative classes as a portion of the community who had not hitherto been reached by the relief committees. Hon. Members who did not reside on the spot could have but little idea of the calamitous condition of the small tradesmen in the manufacturing districts. Many of these were perfectly destitute, dependent, as they had been, upon the wages paid to the operatives. Some notion, however, might be formed of the distress to which these persons were reduced, when they were told that the diminution of wages up to the present time, owing to the distress, might be calculated at no less than £8,000,000 sterling per annum. If the operatives had been in receipt of this sum, the greater part of it would have been spent among the small shopkeepers, who were now, he undertook to say, among the most distressed persons in the community, not excepting even another very unfortunate class—the small cottage-holders, and those who had invested their savings in other branches of industry—whom the committees felt it almost impossible to relieve, owing to the many abuses which would immediately spring up in dealing with the monies intrusted to them. His right hon. Friend had, however, very justly observed, "What would have been the case but for the munificence displayed by every class of the community at this critical juncture?" He had made a calculation as to the amount contributed for the relief of the operatives in the distressed districts, and had estimated that it could not be less than £1,400,000. He believed, indeed, that that sum was within the mark. The sum spent in the relief of distress by the local committees was £658,000, and the amount disbursed by the Poor Law Guardians during the last six months was, he believed, £250,000. Here was a total of £908,000 spent for the relief of the operative classes since the passing of the Relief Act last Session. Let any person try to imagine what must have been the difference in the condition of those classes if these large sums had not been contributed by a benevolent public. Even with all the aid afforded by the Act, the state of Lancashire would have been frightful. Now, the House had a right, he thought, when it was asked to give its assent to the renewal of such a measure, what were the present and future prospects of the manufacturing districts. The committee of which he had the honour to be a member had taken every possible means to ascertain the opinions of the most experienced manufacturers as to the present and probable future state of employment in their several localities. He was sorry to say that at the last meeting of the Central Committee the reports they received from those gentlemen induced the Committee to believe that they had not yet seen by any means the extent of the destitution with which they would have to contend. Other hon. Members would doubtless go into this part of the case more fully than he had; but he would state, as the result of consultation with the principal manufacturers, that the most sanguine of them looked for an average of employment during the next twelve months of only three days per week, whilst the less sanguine—who were by far the more numerous—did not anticipate that there would be an average of more than two days employment per week, taking the whole manufacturing population together. Under those circumstances the Relief Committee had felt themselves bound to deal most carefully with the funds—large though they were—intrusted to their care. Sometimes they had been charged with being too niggardly, and at other times with being too liberal in their distribution of the money. These charges were certainly inconsistent, and he ventured to assert that they were both totally unfounded; and he felt confident—though, doubtless, abuses would now and then occur—that, upon the whole, they had been promptly checked, and that the funds had been administered with discretion. He had to thank his right hon. Friend for the assistance rendered by the Board of which he was at the head, by placing at their disposal Mr. Farnall, who was a gentleman of great experience, zeal, and energy, and who had devoted his time and attention to the matter, and had given the most valuable aid and information to the Committee—never, indeed, appearing to have a moment which he was not devoting in some way or other to their and the public service. But for the assistance rendered by that gentleman, the Committee would never have been able to perform their duties to their own satisfaction. The Board had also sent down two other officers—Mr. Adamson and Mr. Jones—and with their aid the Committee had been enabled, he believed, to take proper precautions against abuses of the fund. The question began to be asked whether, under these circumstances, it was necessary that the public should still be called upon to continue their benevolent contributions for the relief of the distressed operatives in Lancashire. He was bound to say, from all the information which he had received, that it was possible they would have still to rely upon that benevolence. Every month the Committee published and disseminated as widely as possible a statement of affairs, which he would invite all who were interested to read, and from which they could judge for themselves as to the propriety of continuing their benevolent exertions. Reverting again to the abuses likely to spring out of the management and distribution of so large a charitable fund, he observed that when half a million of persons were out of work, and likely to continue so for a long period, he did not think that any one should feel surprised at some great public detriment accruing from it, however wisely the public charity might be disbursed. At the present moment they were devoting their attention to enforcing a system of labour through the agency of the local committees, and the Vice Chairman of the Central Committee (Sir James Kay Shuttleworth) was at that moment engaged in devising a mode by which to give greater employment to the people throughout the districts. He (Colonel Wilson Patten) sincerely hoped he would be successful; but after everything was done that could be done there must still of necessity be a certain kind of demoralization among a portion of the inhabitants of the distressed districts. This must be accepted as in some degree unavoidable. The calamity, however, was not an unmixed evil. When the season of trial was over, they would have to look back upon many encouraging circumstances to which it had given rise. There was not a class of the people in Lancashire who were not perfectly aware who were the donors of the money which was administered to them. The Committee took care that the name of every contributor should be sent through the whole of the country. There was one class of donors whom he desired especially on that occasion to thank. He referred to the residents in foreign countries and in the colonies. The House would be surprised to hear the names of all the places from which these contributions had come. They had flowed in from every quarter of the globe. He did not refer to the money which had been sent to the Committee presided over by the Lord Mayor, because he had not a copy of that subscription list, but only to that which had come direct to the Central Committee. Besides a vast array of places in Great Britain and Ireland, handsome contributions had been sent from the United States, Madeira, Russia, Brazil, Gibraltar, Spain, Holland, Italy, Egypt, Turkey, Germany, Cape of Good Hope, India, China, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Australia. No less than £46,630 had been sent to the Committee from Australia—a contribution which he could not help characterizing as one of the most liberal made in any country under such circumstances. He did not like to single out particular towns for special mention, as it might appear invidious to do so. He could only say that there were places in the colonies as to the locality of which his geography was more than once at a loss, but who sent donations sometimes amounting to thousands of pounds. He had never witnessed such an outburst of sympathy as had been displayed from every part of the world towards the distressed operatives in England. He could only repeat that this charitable feeling would not be thrown away upon the people of Lancashire. There was a thorough conviction among all parties and classes in the county that they were deeply indebted to the donors. They were sensible of the interest taken in their welfare by all classes of the community. The result would be a lasting feeling of gratitude on the part of the Lancashire people to every class of society, not only in this country, but in every part of the world.

THE LORD MAYOR (Mr. Alderman Rose) said, he owed an apology to the House for rising on this occasion, being so very young a Member; but he felt it his duty to caution the House with regard to some of the remarks of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down. It was true that most magnificent subscriptions had been received from all parts of the world; and it was true that these subscriptions had been sent in a way that redounded to the credit, not only of the country, but of all connected with them. But he warned the House that the time was coming when these voluntary subscriptions could no longer be depended upon; and that the machinery, which it was proposed to be continued for another twelve months, would have to be brought forcibly into operation. Nor was it only that the contributions would cease, but the manner in which this great object had monopolized the charity of the nation had proved very prejudicial to other philanthropic enterprises, and the subscriptions were beginning to revert to the original channels from which they had been withdrawn by the exigency of this great crisis. From his experience, having had the collection and distribution of nearly half a million of money in consequence of the office he had the honour to hold, he feared the time was rapidly approaching when this source of income might fail. It was important, therefore, that the House should be prepared with machinery by which any possible want which might arise might be supplied by a more sure source of income than voluntary charity.

Mr. HIBBERT thanked the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board for the statement he had made, and for having afforded the House an opportunity of discussing this important subject. Too strong words of thankfulness could not be used for the great stream of charity which had flowed into Lancashire during the past twelve months; nor ought thanks to be omitted to the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) and the hon. and gallant Colonel opposite (Colonel Wilson Patten) for the great labour they had given to the administration of the relief fund. He would give the House some particulars as to the condition of Oldham. The population of the Oldham Union was 111,267. Out of this population 39,975 were operatives. At the end of last month (January 31) only 8,028 persons were working full, and 20,726 were working short time, leaving more than 10,000 entirely unemployed. The number receiving relief from the guardians at the same date was 10,589, and from the relief committees 13,245 making altogether 23,834 persons. This was out of a population of 111,267, showing that one out of every five of the population was in a state of destitution. A great deal had been said in other places with regard to the amount of the poor rates in Lancashire; but as far as the Borough of Oldham was concerned, he would state a few facts which would show how severely those rates were pressing. One rate of 2s. in the pound was made in March last, and 4,120 persons were obliged to be excused by the magistrates from paying it on account of their destitution. In October a second rate was made of 2s. in the pound, of which £5,885 could not be collected on account of the distress of the people. In December last another rate was made of 4s. in the pound, of which a large amount of arrears were now unpaid. Thus in a period of nine months rates had been made and levied to the amount of 8s. in the pound. It was, however, very difficult to judge from the Poor Law Returns of the pressure which the rates inflicted upon the ratepayers. For example, the Returns laid on the table by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Villiers) showed that during the quarter ending at Christmas there had been expended in the relief of the poor in Oldham 1s. 3½d. in the pound. This would give 5s. in the pound for the year. But, instead of having paid only 5s. in the pound for the year, the ratepayers had paid 8s. in the pound for only three-quarters of the year. The Return, therefore, did not afford a full view of the case as it really stood. The number of assessments in Oldham showed that there was a great body of very small ratepayers in the borough. In October, 1862, there were 16,190 assessments to the poor rate. Of this number 6,900 were between £10 and £6; and there were 6,190 assessments under £6; making, out of the whole number of assessments, rather more than 13,000 persons assessed under the value of £10 per annum. These facts showed how very great must have been the pressure of the heavy rates of the past nine months. The unemployed ratepayers had either to be excused or the rates to be left in arrear, and they could only be collected from those who were able to pay. The whole rate for the union of Oldham in the year 1861 was little more than 1s. in the pound. This was another proof how severe the pressure of the 8s. rate for nine months must have been. With regard to the Act of last Session, he would observe that there was a strong feeling among the boards of guardians that the time for the repayment of loans was not sufficiently extended. There was also a strong feeling in Lancashire, that although there was no wish to dip their hands into the national purse, the Public Loan Commissioners should be empowered to lend money to boards of guardians. In conclusion, he would only say that the rates were pressing most severely, not only upon the poorer ratepayers, but on the owners of cottages and on small mill-owners, who had borrowed capital to carry on their business; and that if the distress continued, the House would see class after class added to the number of destitute persons.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, he was afraid the right hon. Gentleman had forgotten some of the principles which had always been maintained by his predecessors in office. One principle of the Poor Law was, that land, or real property, was answerable for the poor rates. Why, then, if the land was answerable for the support of the poor, had not the right hon. Gentleman made the landlords responsible, whose lands had derived so much benefit from the mills? There could be no doubt that Lancashire had derived the greatest benefit from the cotton manufacture. A large portion of Cheshire was entirely agricultural; and it was not fair that the agricultural landlords or tenants of South Cheshire should be called upon to pay rates for the landlords and millowners of North Cheshire. The farmer in South Cheshire had taken his land thinking he would have to maintain his own poor only; and why should he be called upon to pay for the poor of North Cheshire? If a landlord, instead of getting £1, or £2, or £3 per acre for his land, got £1, or £2, or £3 per yard, surely there was no harm in asking him, when a tenant was in distress, to pay a part of the rates of his tenant. He would suggest that after the rates reached a certain amount—say 5s. in the pound—the landlord should be called upon to contribute equally with the tenant. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) had thrown out a hint that the credit of the country might be given to enable Lancashire to effect loans. He (Sir Baldwin Leighton) hoped the credit of Lancashire was not so low that it was necessary to have the credit of the country added to it. There was no union, he believed, which could not raise money at four per cent. He had himself borrowed money for several unions at four per cent, and only ones had he paid more, and that was when he borrowed from the Exchequer Loan Commissioners, who charged five per cent. He would, however, ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he was prepared to carry out throughout England the principles he was now applying to Lancashire and Cheshire? In London there were parishes which paid regularly no less than 5s. in the pound for poor rates. If Lancashire was to be relieved from the payment of a 5s. rate, why should not the parishes of London? In London there were no less than nineteen parishes where the poor rates were more than 3s. in the pound. In Buckinghamshire there were forty-four, and in Cornwall nine such parishes, but in Cheshire there were only three parishes in which the rates were more than 3s. in the pound. Were they prepared to empower the heavily burdened parishes in the east of London to put their hands into the pockets of the ratepayers and say, "You must support us"? He repeated the question—Was the right hon. Gentleman prepared to carry out the principle of the Bill to all England? Because if he were not, the principle he had laid down was not right, and it could not be defended. The Bill, therefore, ought not to be passed without due consideration. There was also another consideration to be borne in mind, and that was the principle upon which relief should be given to the poor. He was not about to question the administration of the Poor Law in Lancashire generally, but in going through Lancashire he had been very much struck by the absence of employment offered by the guardians to the persons who were receiving relief. This was a great fault. The poor were much to be pitied; but the plan which was adopted was detrimental to them, for they were receiving for doing nothing as much or more as the labourers in his (Sir Baldwin Leighton's) part of the country who worked six days in the week. In Lancashire a man with a family of three children received 12s. per week, but in his part of the country the able-bodied labourer would receive only 10s. per week. He could not but think that if a little more pressure was put upon the manufacturers they would find some occupation for the operatives who were now out of employment. If emigration could not be resorted to, migration might. It was doubtless for the benefit of the millowners and shopkeepers that the people should remain in the district, but it was of great detriment to the people themselves; and gen-clermen serving on relief committees, as well as the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Poor Law Board, should use every means in their power to prevent so serious an injury. Persons now in idleness and in the enjoyment of an allowance equal to what was considered fair wages in the agricultural districts, would be very apt to remember the circumstance in after times, when that reminiscence might tend materially to swell the poor rates.

LORD STANLEY said, he rose only to offer a single suggestion—that it might be better to limit the operation of the Bill to six instead of twelve months, as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. A period of six months would carry them over the Session, and afford the House an opportunity of reconsidering the subject in June or July, when they would be able to make such provision for the recess as might then be required, having had the advantage of that additional period of observation. It might be that the aspect of affairs might then be very different from what it was at present, and some modification of the law might be seen to be necessary. By the Bill as it stood the House was asked to legislate for the relief of distress in Lancashire up to February next. Neither the right hon. Gentleman nor any man in the House or out of it would undertake to say what might be the state of Lancashire distress in February next. It was all guess work. Every one was in the dark. No two men agreed in their opinions as to what was likely to happen, and those who understood the subject best would be readiest to admit that their opinions were mere conjectures. Was it not wise, then, to commit themselves as little as possible; to refrain from tying their hands further than was absolutely necessary? No doubt, the course he recommended would entail additional trouble upon Parliament; but in dealing with questions of this kind he ventured to think that mere considerations of trouble would not have any weight. He did not say that they would be in a position to legislate with certainty in June or July, but it was quite possible by that time that things might so far have changed that they might look at the question in a different point of view from that in which they saw it now. Various alterations had been and might be proposed in the present Bill, such as giving borrowing powers to townships as well as to Unions, extending the term allowed for repayment; and he had heard a suggestion, which he did not adopt, that Government might be empowered to lend under certain conditions. He did not say that any of these propositions ought to be entertained, but they ought all to be maturely discussed, and he felt sure that Parliament would be much better prepared to deal with the question towards the close of the Session than it was at present. What he suggested was, therefore, simply a continuance Bill for six months, and then another discussion upon the subject.

Mr. ALDERMAN SIDNEY thought the suggestion of the noble Lord was a wise one. This was a matter which required the grave consideration of the Legislature, and not alone as regarded Lancashire, though that demanded a more enlarged view of the general law of the question than was proposed by this measure. If the Government allowed the present Session to pass away without attempting a great legislation upon the inequitable state of the Poor Law, he thought there would be a well-founded cause of dissatisfaction, more especially as in the present state of public business there was little of deeper interest to engage the attention of the House. The House was treating this question as if the condition of Lancashire was exceptional to the general state of the country. Hon. Members had favoured the House last Session with their views on the inequalities of the poor rate in the southern districts, and they had the testimony of the hon. Member for Oldham that at the present moment the rates amounted to upwards of 8s. The assessable property in Lancashire was in excess of £8,000,000. Now, an equalized rate of 3s. 7½d. would not only have raised the £1,000,000 in excess occasioned by the distress, but have provided for the £400,000, which was the average amount of the poor rates for the county of Lancashire. But he doubted very seriously whether the distress in Lancashire, great as it undoubtedly was, exceeded that in the metropolitan district of Bethnal-green, where he was told the condition of the poorer classes was frightful to contemplate. Yet they heard comparatively little of destitution in that quarter; it was lost sight of in the immensity of the Lancashire claims. He was likewise unable to say whether the depression in the manufacturing districts exceeded in severity that at Coventry. But he took it for granted the Legislature could not view such instances of the breaking-down of the Poor Law system in so important a county as Lancashire without taking some steps to remedy the general defect in the law. Were the Government prepared to remedy these defects over the country at large? The present measure was a wise one viewed as a temporary expediency, and he was in favour of another temporary Bill; but should feel greatly dissatisfied if he learned that the Government had no intention of taking further action for improving the general system of administration, and especially in the important matter of the present inequality of the Poor Law rating.

MR. POTTER hoped the right hon. Gentleman would limit this Bill to six months, and in the mean time provide a Bill of a more comprehensive character. He feared that there was no prospect for some time to come of there being a less pressure on the poor rates in Lancashire than existed at present. The loss of wages in Lancashire was certainly not less than £8,000,000 annually; on a moderate calculation one-third of that amount would have to be raised by means of the poor rate, and he was quite satisfied that unless some larger measure were brought forward, the poor rate would collapse. The subscriptions in hand amounted to between £700,000 and £800,000, and they ought not to be deterred from legislating further on the subject by any idea that such a sum would be sufficient to meet the evil. He thought they would require another million from the poor rates. He might state a few facts with regard to the Union of Glossop, with which he was connected, which was considered to be one of the worst in the country. In 1855 the entire rate for the Union of Glossop was only £1,000. He found that latterly they had been paying for the relief of the poor at the rate of £1,000 per week. The assessed rentals in this district amounted to £65,000, out of which £18,700 was for mills and works; £6,200 for houses and shops; cottage property, £22,000; and the remainder for land. The cottages (by far the largest item) belonged almost entirely to the manufacturing population, and were the result of many years' careful savings. There were 4,163 cottages, owned by 782 people. All these cottages were mortgaged and were at present almost worthless to their owners; he did not suppose, that deducting these mortgages, there would be £2,000 left. Look at the pressure laying on a district like that. It would be impossible to raise a 2s. or 3s. rate without a serious collapse. In the whole district there were only sixty-eight buildings rated at above £50 a year. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would bring in some more comprehensive measure. He did not object to the extension of the present Bill. It had not been tested to any extent at present because the large subscriptions had relieved the poor rates; but during the next six months the amount to be raised in Lancashire would be £1,200,000 or £1,500,000, four or five times the amount ever levied before.

MR. COBDEN: Sir, it is not my intention to go into the question at large: but I was struck with the suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), and probably a word or two may be added to the noble Lord's reasons in favour of his propositions. I think we must consider on the present occasion that the great difficulty we have to apprehend will arise towards the close of next winter, assuming that the present war in America goes on, which I humbly pray may not be the case. But assuming things to continue as they now are—and that depends upon whether any cotton comes from America, because all other hopes of alleviation are futile within the next two or three years, unless we do get cotton from America—assuming this state of things to continue, then I think the condition of the cotton districts will be much more serious, much more difficult in the next winter than it was in the last. In the first place, you will not, I am afraid, have that magnificent private benevolence in the form of subscriptions to rely upon which you have had the last winter—and I was glad to hear the hon. Member for Southampton (the Lord Mayor) give us this warning. I do not believe in the history of the world there has been an instance of a repetition of such a magnificent outburst of generosity as that we have witnessed during the last six months for the same object. Great benevolent efforts are in their very nature evanescent, because there are other claims always existing, and others arising to compete with them. I think, therefore, that next winter, assuming that this state of things goes on, will find you without this resource from this benevolent fund, and consequently find you under the necessity of relying entirely upon poor rates at a time when, as has been shown by my hon. Friend immediately above me (Mr. Potter), a large proportion of the rate-payers will have become insolvent: so that you will have a far greater claim upon the rates at the time when your benevolent fund will have ceased, and when much of your rateable property will fall out of the assessment list. This view of the matter becomes still more apparent and more urgent when we call to mind how much has been done in the way of charitable relief and in rates, already, in the manufacturing districts themselves. I would not say a word in derogation of these honourable tributes paid to that world-wide benevolence which has flowed into Manchester; but probably it is not generally known, that, after all, the largest portion of this great fund has come from the cotton districts themselves. I find by the tabulated Return made by Mr. Maclure, the Honorary Secretary of the Relief Committee in Manchester, that the amount raised locally to be dispensed by local committees, and not remitted to the Central Fund, has been £245,000. He states that the amount raised in the cotton district, and remitted to the Central Fund, is £350,000. I will now give an estimate—and I am sure, from the inquiries I have made and the evidence I have taken, that I am very much under the mark—of what does not appear in the table of Mr. Maclure—namely, the amount which has been given by individual millowners and manufacturers and landowners at their own doors—the allowances made to workpeople, and not published in any subscription list at all. There are individual millowners who are giving their workpeople from £20,000 to £30,000 a year. And taking the whole of the cotton district, I estimate that the amount of these private subscriptions, which will not appear in any local or general list, is £250,000—that is to say, that by Midsummer next, in this private way, money to that amount will have been contributed. That will give for the year ending Midsummer next, a total of £845,000 as the amount of contributions for the relief of distress from the cotton districts exclusively. Now, assuming that the whole of the voluntary subscriptions from all parts of the world amounts to £1,500,000, then it should be remembered that considerably more than half of that sum has come from the cotton districts themselves. It is quite evident, therefore, that with regard to a large proportion of those charitable contributions, you cannot look for the same result next year, because these parties will be weakened by the progress of this distress. But that is not all. I find from the same table that the poor rates levied in the distressed unions in excess of their average in former years is at the rate of £600,000 for the year ending Midsummer next; that in round numbers the rate amounts to about £12,000 a week in excess of the former rates. This is a very small share, indeed, of the pressure upon these districts. We have heard it repeatedly stated by those most competent to judge, that the operatives in Lancashire are losing at the rate of from £8,000,000 to £9,000,000 a year by loss of wages. Now, deducting what you have given in the shape of relief from voluntary contributions and from rates, I will take the loss of wages up to Midsummer next to be £6,000,000. But that is not all. You have an enormous loss going on in capital in Lancashire. I estimate the loss of capitalists, arising from loss of interest, depreciation of fixed capital, non-payment of rents of cottages (not including loss of profits, though that is a loss of income), to be at the rate of £5,000,000 for the year up to next Midsummer upon mills, manufactures, and all establishments forming subsidiary branches of the cotton manufacture. That makes the loss of wages and capital £11,000,000 a year. Now, I will put the whole down according to my estimate—

Loss upon wages and capital ...	£11,000,000
Amount of subscriptions...	845,000
Amount of increased poor rates	600,000
Total...	£12,445,000

Why, the whole amount of the voluntary contributions, great and unprecedented as it is, from all parts of the world outside the cotton districts, is hardly 5 per cent (or 1s. in the pound) of that which has been contributed and lost by the manufacturers and labourers in the cotton districts. Now, these facts will show how cumulative the pressure of the suffering will be next winter if the cause of the present distress continues. It is evident that the prostration of this district, however great at present, must be much greater, and my right hon. Friend at the head of the Poor Law Board must take this into consideration now. The wisest heads in Lancashire, as has been stated by the hon. and gallant Colonel (Colonel Wilson Patten), who has so honourably distinguished himself in this matter, are those who take the gloomiest view of the prospects of that district for the next twelve months. Well, all this may be to a large extent mitigated provided the war comes to an end in the course of the spring. But would it not be well, under all the circumstances, to take into consideration the suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley)? I think some alterations should be made in the Bill, with the view of giving increased facilities to the people more immediately concerned to meet from time to time these great difficulties; but I would submit to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be better to confine the operation of the measure to six months, and then to come again to Parliament; because about Midsummer or the beginning of July we shall be better able to judge what are the prospects for the ensuing winter.

MR. PULLER said, that though a suggestion from the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) and the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) carried great weight, yet he believed that the Government had decided wisely in proposing that the Bill should be continued for the period of twelve months. Sufficient experience had been gained to enable Parliament to come to a tolerably safe conclusion as to what alterations were required, and the proposal of legislating for six months only was open to the objection that people would not apply their minds to the subject with the same energy if the measure were a mere temporary stop-gap as they would if it extended over a longer period. Again, they should remember that a Bill introduced at the end of a Session could not be discussed so fully and so satisfactorily as one introduced at the beginning of a Session. He no doubt thought the present Bill capable of amendment; for instance, with respect to the alternative given to boards of guardians of either borrowing or coming upon the county, it seemed to him, that looking at the great profits made by the cotton districts in more prosperous times, there was no reason why they should not provide for their own poor by borrowing the money. The period of repayment might be extended, if necessary; but the districts which were able ought to bear the burden without coming upon their neighbours for it. If you left it to the caprice of boards of guardians to come upon the county or not, as they pleased, agricultural parishes would feel aggrieved, and would say with justice that the question of their liability to contribute should have been decided by Parliament. The amount thus thrown upon the county might hereafter, if the public subscriptions fell off, be double or quadruple what it now would be, and the agricultural districts would justly complain that there was no uniformity of treatment, and that one union demanded help while another in precisely the same position had borrowed the money.

MR. MUNDY pointed out that the Union of Glossop, although in the county of Derby, was on the edge of Lancashire, and was Lancastrian in all its pursuits; and the unions in the south of Derby considered themselves aggrieved at being called on to contribute to the aid of the distress in a union fifty or sixty miles off. He would have conterminous counties made liable as well as conterminous unions. The great county of York, for instance, bordering on Lancashire, would hardly feel a rate in aid. He would extend the liability to the rate in aid to contiguous unions and counties as well as to parishes.

MR. J. B. SMITH concurred in the suggestion that the continuation of the Act should be limited to six months, and suggested that an inquiry should be made by Committee or Commission into the present state of the manufacturing districts. At present our information came almost entirely from one source, the boards of guardians; but information was required from all sources whence it was available.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS: There will be opportunities hereafter of considering the entire question, and I do not think it will be convenient to continue the present discussion. I have listened very carefully to the observations which have fallen from hon. Members, and they shall receive my most respectful consideration; but I think it would be better to postpone giving a decision at present.

MR. J. B. SMITH: When does the right hon. Gentleman propose to take the second reading?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS: On this day week.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to extend for a further period the provisions of the Union Relief Aid Act of the last Session, ordered to be brought in by Mr. VILLIERS and Mr. GILPIN.

Bill presented, and read 1^o [Bill 17.].

TELEGRAPHS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. MILNER GIBSON moved for leave to bring in a Bill "to regulate the Exercise of Powers under Special Acts for the construction and maintenance of Telegraphs." It was a measure to consolidate into one Act the various provisions contained in special Acts obtained by electric telegraph companies. Anything already done under existing Acts would not be affected; but the general Act would control all future operations. The measure was one entirely of detail.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. MILNER GIBSON and Mr. HUTT.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 16.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, February 13, 1863.

ROADS IN SCOTLAND.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE inquired, Whether the Government intend to introduce any Measure for the better Management of Roads in Scotland? The attempt which had hitherto been made to abolish tolls on the roads in Scotland had failed, and he was not surprised at it. But there was another class of roads, known as the statute labour roads, which were kept in repair by assessment of property. The funds raised for this purpose were quite inadequate, and the result was that the roads were every year getting worse and worse, and it was very desirable that some change should be effected. All they wanted was to get power to assess themselves for this purpose; and he believed that if the Government were to introduce a measure with this object, it would receive the general support of the Scotch Members.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL supposed that the question of his noble Friend referred to the Bill introduced two years ago for the abolition of tolls on the roads in Scotland. With regard to that measure, the reception which it had received was not calculated to encourage the Government to introduce that measure again. That was, in fact, one of the points—almost the only point—on which it was impossible to get harmony of action among the Scotch Members of Parliament. He should suggest that the best method of meeting the evil was for each county to do that which was done in the county with which he was more immediately connected—get a local Act and assess itself under it.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE said, that a general Road Act would operate unfairly, because it would throw the burden of the maintenance of the roads on the owners of property, and not on those who, like omnibus and coach proprietors, made the most use of the roads. In fact, the great promoters of road reform in Scotland were the owners of public vehicles, who, under the proposed change, would be entirely exempted from payment of the tolls to which they were now liable. The statute labour roads stood on a different footing, and it was desirable that more money should be raised for their maintenance.

THE INDIAN ARMY.

PETITIONS OF INDIAN OFFICERS PRESENTED.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH, in presenting Petitions from Indian Officers, complaining of the Loss of Advantages sustained by reason of the Amalgamation of the British and Indian Armies, and praying for Relief, said, these officers alleged that the pledge which Parliament had given to them two years ago, that all the advantages of pay, pension, promotion, allowances and privileges of every description should be maintained to them in any plan that might be adopted for the amalgamation of the Indian army, had not been kept. The view which he took of that Act was that Parliament entered into an engagement for the protection of the interests and rights, not of the army as a body, but of every individual in the army; and that whatever advantages, in the way of promotion or otherwise, each individual might have possessed at the time of the passing of that Act he was still entitled to—that the Crown had taken the government of India subject to that condition, and that that must be faithfully adhered to in every particular. Economy could have no voice where the question was one of justice, and he trusted that that was the view of the question that would be taken by the Government and by Parliament. This preservation of the rights and privileges of the Indian officers and of the men serving in the Indian army would in no way conflict with the power of the Crown to re-organize the whole body of the Indian army. That power remained as it was. But consistently with that re-organization the Crown must maintain the interests and rights of the officers as they existed on the day the Act was passed. One of the petitioners stated that in 1838 a letter from the Court of Directors granted to all colonels in receipt of certain payments, now called colonels' allowances, who might be unemployed in India, all the advantages of Indian pay and allowances. These were claimed by the petitioner, who occupied this position. No doubt, he was quite covered by the words of the Act of Parliament. It was contrary to the spirit and the words of the Act that he should not be allowed these advantages. There was another case of a somewhat different nature. An officer said that he was now eighth on the list of Engineer colonels, and that by the old arrangement on becoming fifth on the list he would have received a higher allowance; but according to the new arrangement he would not be entitled to receive that allowance till he was fourth on the list. That would appear at first sight to be a case of hardship, and contrary altogether to the Act of Parliament. But he understood that that officer had, in consequence of the very arrangement now complained of, been advanced from the rank of lieutenant-colonel to that of colonel; and had been in receipt for some time of colonel's allowances. Now, while this officer was undoubtedly entitled to all the advantages which attached to his position when the Act passed, it was not consistent with justice that he should derive all the advantages of the reorganization, and then have compensation for any accompanying loss which he might have sustained. The only proper mode of dealing with such a case was to take into account both the advantages and the disadvantages to which that officer had been subjected under the new system and then to effect a fair adjustment between him and the public. Other smaller matters might be mentioned, but the real question which interested the whole army not employed on the staff was the question of promotion. The complaint made was that the promotion of the officers of the army had been in three several ways impeded by the reorganization. They complained that they were not, according to ancient right, permitted to succeed to every vacancy created by retirement. When, in February, 1861, the Government offered as a bonus an additional annuity of £50 to field officers willing to retire from the service, it allowed that promotions should take place in the case of every vacancy so created. When, six months later, it was found that this offer produced only fifty-six applicants, the Government increased its terms so largely that in some cases the annuity offered was eleven times, and in no case was it less than four times, the amount first offered. But when that was done, although promotion was given in the case of captains and majors, it was refused in the case of one half of the lieutenant-colonels. However inconvenient it might be that the whole of these lieutenant-colonels should be replaced by officers coming forward by promotion, still he apprehended it was altogether inconsistent with ancient practice and the rights of the Indian army, and the Act of Parliament which maintained those rights, that they should not have enjoyed the whole of the promotions opened up by the retirement of these lieutenant-colonels. There was another grievance which was complained of under the head of promotion. It was complained, that promotion was not granted in the case of the transfer of officers from the former regiments—from the European regiments to the new regiments that had been formed. These regiments were called by the petitioners "new regiments," whilst the Government denominated them "representative regiments"—a kind of regiment of which he had never before heard—and considered them as representing the old. Formerly there were in the Company's service nine regiments of infantry, and six or four of cavalry. For these were now substituted nine regiments of infantry, and three of cavalry in Her Majesty's service; and it was offered to the various companies and men to volunteer into these regiments, it having been understood that without the volunteering of these men, these regiments could not be formed, inasmuch as the Queen's regiments were available for general service, whereas the Company's regiments were for local service. Thus there was both the representative thing and the thing represented; there was no conversion of whole regiments into representative regiments or anything like it. The complaint was that promotion was not so rapid as it ought to be, in consequence of the transfer of these officers into the new regiments not being followed by the promotion of officers in their room. He could not say he took a very decided view on that subject. He desired that a Commission or a Committee might be appointed, with power to search the records of both services to look for precedents and discover, if possible, any precedent for the conversion of old into representative regiments, or any conversion at all resembling it—so that by direct precedent or analogy they might be guided in their opinion on the subject. It was a subject that required deliberate inquiry, and he could not at present give an opinion on it. But the great grievance of all, the complaint in which the officers were most interested, was that which they made on account of the formation of the Staff Corps, which was a new regiment, or what they called a new regiment. The transfer of no moderate number, some 1,300 officers to the Staff Corps, gave them, as they held, a right of promotion in the place of the officers so transferred. He did not take altogether the view adopted by the petitioners on this subject; and on this ground, that these gentlemen who were now called the Staff Corps, although they did not by any means all belong to the staff of the army—on the contrary, many of them held political or civil and administrative appointments, or posts in the commissariat and elsewhere connected with the army—yet these offices always were held by these officers, and there was no new grievance in this respect. It was true that these officers often returned to their regiments at periods very disadvantageous to the public service, when their rank enabled them to take the command although having no military experience; but this had been a standing subject of complaint for the last forty or fifty years. The position of the petitioners was not, therefore, in this respect worse since the day when the Act was passed; and the grievance was not created by the re-organization of the army, or its transfer to the Crown. What the petitioners said, was that these officers were relieved from regimental charges altogether. They did not subscribe to the mess or the band, and they did not contribute to the fund for buying out officers at the head of regiments. They were, however, subject to rules, which the Government said regulated, but the petitioners said retarded, promotion. One of these officers, having attained a higher rank through the more rapid promotion in the Staff Corps, might be sent back to take the command of his regiment over his seniors, and while his name appeared in the roll of the regiment as a subaltern. It had been arranged that officers of the Staff Corps should obtain promotion according to the number of years they had served, and thus they obtained promotion a great deal sooner than others. Now, no one who was conversant with the feelings of officers could fail to know that the most galling thing to them was supersession, and yet it was a necessary consequence of the system that those officers who remained with their regiments should be superseded, and that the Staff Corps should be much more rapidly promoted. Another inconvenience attached to the system was that, detached as these officers were from their regiments, they did not contribute either to the band or mess, and the consequence was that it became difficult to maintain either the one or the other. This tended to disorganize or non-regimentalize a regiment and to destroy its esprit de corps. Some parts of the prayer of the petitioners it would, no doubt, be difficult, if not impossible, to grant. The petitioners complained, that whilst they existed together as a regiment, and before the establishment of this Staff Corps, the officers now employed on the service nominally called the staff used to contribute their quota in order to buy out their senior officers for more rapid promotion. All that had been contributed for this purpose was now utterly thrown away. This was no doubt a great hardship, but the Government were of opinion that it was out of their power to remedy it, and indeed, he understood, a legal opinion had been given to the effect that such a contribution was similar to the buying of an office, which was illegal, and therefore that money paid for this purpose could not be recovered. But there were means, he thought, of alleviating these grievances. The rules of the Staff Corps with regard to promotion gave an unusual and unreasonable advantage to officers of that corps. The Government, having contracted with these officers, must comply with the terms they had offered, and give them substantive rank; but there was nothing to prevent the Government from extending the privileges already given to the Staff Corps to the infantry and cavalry, after a certain number of years' service. Thus, brevet rank would, after a certain number of years, be conferred upon officers remaining with their regiments. Thus what he believed to be the main grievance would be done away with. There was nothing, also, to prevent the Government from supplying regiments, which were deprived of the subscriptions of their absent officers, with funds for the maintenance of their bands and mess. He had endeavoured to look at the whole question calmly and dispassionately, and he was sure their Lordships would agree that in all transactions with men the only honourable course, and with soldiers the only prudent course, was that of strict justice; and he would remind their Lordships of what the Duke of Wellington said, that in dealing with soldiers you must not only be just, but make them understand that you were so.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the speech of the noble Earl had greatly relieved his mind. He had anxiously considered whether the grievances of the officers of the Indian army were just, and he had come to the conclusion that there was no shadow of ground for the complaint that the guarantees of the Act of Parliament had been violated. It was a serious question whether the Government had fulfilled the intentions of the Legislature and the promises made by Parliament and the Crown, and had kept faith with the officers of that noble service to which England and India owed so much. He agreed also with the noble Earl that the Legislature ought not to look simply to the question of economy in considering the interpretation of a Parliamentary guarantee. He could not, however, help remarking that in almost every case of individual complaint the noble Earl had made some important qualification, implying that the guarantee given by Parliament had not in that particular case been violated. He spoke of the guarantee in general terms, but their Lordships should understand exactly what that guarantee was, and the circumstances under which it had been given. The guarantee to which the noble Earl adverted was, he believed, that known as the Henley Clause in the Act transferring the government of India from the Company to the Crown. This Act declared that the officers of the Company should be under the same obligation to serve Her Majesty as those under which they had served the Company. They were bound to serve within the same territorial limits, on the same terms, at the same rate of pay, pension, and allowance, and were to enjoy the same rights as regarded promotion as those who served in the service of the Company. This was not a guarantee that they should all remain exactly in the same position, though substantially he admitted that in any reorganization of the Indian army it amounted to a promise that the Government would not put these officers in a worse position than they were before. The guarantee, for example, was not to prevent the Government, in its new form, from adopting any measure which it would have been competent and natural for the Government in its old form to take,—or to preclude it from any policy which in an Imperial point of view might be desirable for reducing the army and economising the resources of the State; but the guarantee was that in carrying out any such reforms care should be taken to protect the interests of the officers of the army. Now, he would not only say that this guarantee had been absolutely fulfilled; but he was prepared to say that in reorganizing the Indian army the officers of the old Company had been dealt with in a large and liberal spirit. The Government determined to effect a large reduction of the native army. The spirit of the implied guarantee was, that such reduction should be carried out on the same principle as the old Company would have carried it out. Now, he need not ask the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief of the British Army what the effect upon each individual officer would be of a determination to reduce the British Army. Their Lordships all knew, that while the men would be disbanded, every single officer in the disbanded regiments would be reduced to half pay; and no one knew better than the illustrious Duke, that if he went to the Chancellor of the Exchequer or to the Government to ask that these officers should receive not only their full pay, but also their pensions, such a request would be little likely to be complied with; yet this was the course which had been followed by the Indian Government in regard to every one of the Indian officers. Take the case of the Bengal army. When the mutiny broke out, the great army of Bengal consisted of seventy-four battalions. When the mutiny was suppressed, of these seventy-four battalions only eleven remained with their arms in their hands—only eleven had remained faithful to the Government. After the mutiny it was determined to reduce the battalions from seventy-four to fifty-two in number. Every one of the officers in the reduced regiments was put, not upon half pay, but full pay, with large allowances.

He had, therefore, a right to contend that the spirit as well as the letter of the guarantee had been complied with. Not one single officer had been deprived of any of his pay or of any advantage he had possessed before. They were kept on full pay, and in many instances enjoyed staff appointments besides. So far, too, from the change being carried out in a manner injuriously affecting the prospects of the officers, it very largely increased and accelerated their promotion. An offer was made to every field officer in the Indian army, and to half the captains, to retire on full pay, with an estimated value for the prospect of promotion and full terms for allowances. How many officers took advantage of that proposal? Why, not less than 270 officers accepted those conditions. They, of course, were not entitled to complain, and they were, in fact, perfectly satisfied with the liberality of the Government. Their Lordships would not fail to see how enormously the retirement of this large body of officers had accelerated the promotion of the rest. Many officers had gained from forty to fifty steps in the army thereby; and yet many of the petitioners complained of the great stagnation of promotion. No doubt after such an amount of promotion artificially produced, what he might call the annual crop of retirement and promotion was for a time retarded, but only because it had been in fact anticipated. He had taken the trouble of referring to The Army List, and seeing what had been the position of an individual officer who had presented one of these petitions, and he found, that so far from his being injuriously affected by any measure which the Government had taken, he had gained, by their liberality and by the offer they had made for these new retirements, not less than forty-seven steps, and was brought nearer to his promotion by some three or four years. So much with regard to the question of reduction. He maintained that the Government had a perfect right to reduce its military force, although, of course, that reduction ought to be conducted in a manner as little detrimental as possible to the interests of Indian officers. That, however, he contended had been done; the promotion of those officers having been accelerated, and advantages having been even conferred on that army to which it had no strict claim. Then he came to the question of the Staff Corps, the point on which almost all the petitions principally dwelt. Their Lordships were probably aware that it had been the practice of the old Indian Government to administer the affairs of India largely by the aid of officers of the Indian army. Those officers had been employed in the discharge of every kind of duty—purely civil and purely political—as well as of duties half civil and half military. They were taken promiscuously from different regiments, according as the individual officer was thought fit for each particular appointment. Every one of these officers was, nevertheless, continued on the strength of the regiment from which he was chosen. That system was supposed to have injuriously affected the discipline of the regiments from which these officers were withdrawn, and one of the very last acts of Lord Dalhousie's Government was to direct the attention of the Home Government to the serious influence which their abstraction had, and was likely, if continued, to have on the Native army; because it should be remembered that it was not merely that a regiment was deprived of a certain proportion of its officers, but its best officers were regularly picked out and sent away to other employment. That was an evil which would have been equally felt, whether there had or had not been a transference of the Government of India from the Company to the Crown, and whether what was called the Amalgamation Bill had or had not been passed. What, then, had been the remedy proposed? It had been urged by Sir Henry Lawrence, and indeed by a general concurrence of opinion in India, that there should be a separate body formed, from which, and from which alone, these staff officers should be taken. But as fears had been expressed that under the new system it would be difficult to get officers to devote their lives to the service of India as had previously been the case, it had been recommended that considerable inducements should be held out to English officers, whether of the Queen's army or otherwise, with a view to overcome that difficulty. A new code of regulations and conditions was accordingly drawn up for the Staff Corps, which regulated promotion on terms which offered some advantage over regimental service. But no man had a right to complain of this. The Parliamentary guarantee was, that the position of no man should be made worse by the changes effected; it was not a guarantee that no man's position should be made better. But if we gave new advantages under new conditions, it was in the nature of things that only a certain portion of that army would be able to avail itself of them, and, no doubt, those who could not do so might consider themselves prejudiced by the arrangement. That, however, did not flow from the amalgamation, nor from any violation of the Parliamentary guarantee, but from a great measure of policy for the general benefit of the empire. Alternative remedies had been suggested by these officers. One was that all the officers who went upon the Staff Corps should be removed from the strength of the regiments, and that promotion should go on in the regiments, filling up the vacancies thus created. It should be observed that the evil they complained of was that the advantages of the new system were unequally distributed. Look at the remedy they proposed for that. In the Bombay army what would be its effect upon two regiments—for example, the 4th and 5th Native Infantry? It so happened that in the first of those regiments only four or five officers had volunteered into the Staff Corps, while in the second fourteen or fifteen had done so, all of them being captains. What, then, would be the result of removing these names from the strength of the regiments and allowing promotion to go on as suggested? Why, in the 4th Native Infantry it would have very little effect, four or five men going a step upwards; whereas in the 5th Regiment one of the junior lieutenants would be immediately promoted to the rank of major, and after about nine years' service he would thus be placed over the head of men who had been fourteen or fifteen or twenty years in the army? The other alternative suggested was that special promotion to the Staff Corps only should cease. Now, that was a question of general policy, and no man was entitled to complain, as a personal grievance, that it had been determined in a way to put others before himself. If it were desirable as a matter of Imperial policy to offer special advantages to officers of the Staff Corps, that certainly in no way infringed the Parliamentary guarantee given to the officers of the Indian army. Their position remained exactly what it had been before in respect to regimental promotion. He now came to another point mentioned in the petitions. When the number of regiments of the native army was reduced, of course the number of colonelcies had to be reduced also; and he did not see that any man was then entitled by the guarantee to demand that his prospects in respect to the command of a regiment should remain precisely what they were before that reduction. At the same time, in order to meet the claims of those officers in a still larger and more liberal spirit, a new rule had very recently been adopted by the Indian Government, providing that all lieutenant-colonels, after they had served twelve years, should be in a position to become entitled to regimental allowances. He did not know whether that would entirely meet the views of some of these officers, because he believed that many of them had extravagant expectations; but he maintained that the Government had not only faithfully adhered to the guarantee, but given it a large and liberal interpretation in their favour. He had a statement in his hand, showing the actual effect of the new regulations. The total number of officers in the Indian army on the 1st of January, 1861, exclusive of colonels of regiments, was 5,309. Of these, the number who had joined the Staff Corps was 1,333. [THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: Of whom 19 only were Queen's officers.] Just so; and therefore the whole of the rest were officers of the old Native army. The number who had been transferred to the British service—Artillery, Engineers, and new Line regiments—was 1,356. The number who had accepted annuities and retired was 270. The promotion which had been given in the Indian army as a consequence of these several measures were as follows: in the Staff Corps 22 officers had been promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, 342 to that of major, 301 to that of captain, and 4 to that of lieutenant, making together 669. By transfers to the new Line regiments the following promotions had taken place among the Indian officers: 3 to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, 17 to that of major, 63 to that of captain, and 15 to that of lieutenant. The officers who had received promotion in consequence of the retirements occasioned by the offer of extra annuities were as follows:—49 to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, 87 to the rank of major, and 103 to the rank of captain, making together 239. The total number of promotions made among 3,683 officers who remained in the Indian service was no less than 908—a very large proportion in a very short period. He had gone into these details because he was anxious to show that full faith had been kept with these officers, and that they had no good ground of complaint whatever. It would have been cause of deep regret to the Government if any action on their part had given any just ground of complaint to the officers of a service to which we owed some of the most memorable days of our military glory, and which had rendered immortal services to the State.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH regretted that only nineteen Queen's officers had entered the Staff Corps, because that corps was hereafter to furnish officers for the whole of the Indian army, and it was only from the Queen's service that it could be recruited. If, therefore, up to the present time only nineteen Queen's officers had joined the corps, he must say that our hopes for the future were not very encouraging.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL asked to be permitted to add to what he had already stated that it was perfectly true that an officer who had been home on sick leave for four years was unable to enter the Staff Corps on his return to India. When the corps was first formed, it was composed of those officers who were actually at the moment engaged upon staff employment. It was subsequently employed under this condition: that officers seeking to enter should have been on staff employment some time during the previous three years. That regulation, however, in no way affected the prospects of the officer in question, in respect to staff employment, though it did effect his prospects in staff promotion.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, he could not participate in the alarm with which the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) viewed the fact that only nineteen Queen's officers had volunteered into the Staff Corps. It was right their Lordships should remember the circumstances under which the Line officers were invited to enter that corps. The regulations of the corps were perfectly new, and one of the most essential was that all the officers should have a knowledge of the native language. For the acquisition of that knowledge a considerable amount of study was evidently required, and until the position and requirements of the Staff Corps became thoroughly known the Line officers, of course, did not attempt to qualify themselves for admission. The old Indian officers, on the other hand, were already qualified. Now, that the regulations were well understood and the advantages known, he had not the slightest doubt that the number of Queen's officers entering the Staff Corps would prove amply sufficient for the object in view. It should be recollected, moreover, that at the first formation of the corps it was of the greatest importance that the old local officers should volunteer into it. The corps was not only a military corps: it was to supply the whole political and civil staff of India. For such employments the most qualified men at the present moment evidently were the officers of the old local service, who had been hitherto engaged in similar avocations, and who were merely transferring their services from their old regiments to the Staff Corps. With regard to the other grievance that after a term of service they would return to their regiments with a higher rank and supersede other efficient officers, the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) had answered this point so fully, that he had left nothing for him to say; and he would only observe that one of the chief objections to the old system in India was, that the return to his regiment, when on service, of an officer who had been engaged in some civil occupation often led to the displacement of a more efficient officer. Such was the very evil which the Staff Corps was formed to remove, and therefore it was not correct to attribute its formation to the outbreak of the mutiny, though its organization was doubtless accelerated by that deplorable event. Something had been said of the Native regiments, but, in point of fact, those regiments had ceased to exist. The cadres of officers were still in existence, because their perpetuation was necessary for the regulation of promotion; but the officers had no regiments, and therefore it was impossible that they could return to them in a higher grade from the Staff Corps. Here he might be referred to the Madras and Bombay armies; but though he was not aware whether the Government had come to any decision on the subject, he certainly understood that the new system adopted in Bengal was to be gradually extended to the other two Presidencies. He did not think the officers of the Indian army had any real grievance. In the Queen's army, if the number of regiments was reduced, the officers were asked no questions, but simply told their services were not further required for the present, and they were placed on half-pay; whereas, the Government had done its best to diminish the difficulties in the Indian service. He did not believe the officers had lost anything by the recent changes; on the contrary, he believed that the greatest liberality had been shown to them, and he was very glad that that was so, for the position they were placed in was one of the most painful character, and one attributable in no way to the acts of the gallant gentlemen themselves. The noble Earl had remarked upon the declaration required from an officer when he retired from his regiment, to the effect that he would not accept more than the regulation price of his commission. A similar declaration formerly existed in the Line regiments, but it had long since been done away with, for the simple and sufficient reason that it was invariably evaded. He believed that the declaration required in India was given up about the same time; but its abandonment must not be taken as an acknowledgment that a bonus should be given to any officer to induce him to retire. All the other points raised by the noble Earl had been fully discussed, and he could only add that if at any time any considerable reduction should be made in the British Army, he hoped the same liberality would be shown by the country as it had exhibited in the case of the Indian officers. He did not think that any officer of the Indian local service had suffered by the change which had taken place; and he was very glad of it, because he agreed with the noble Earl and the noble Duke that our old Indian officers deserved to be treated in a large and liberal spirit. He was glad this question had been raised, because it had elicited a very clear explanation from his noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) which he hoped would satisfy all the officers concerned that the Government was really anxious to do justice towards them.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL wished to add, that an order had been sent out to India that in no case should an officer be transferred from the staff to the command of a regiment in supersession of any other officer who had been doing regimental duty.

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, to Monday next,

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, February 13, 1863.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Cambridge Borough, Francis Sharp Powell, esquire.
The Duke of Cambridge

RESOLUTIONS IN COMMITTEE.—Post Office Savings Banks; Customs Acts (Tobacco Duties); Drainage (Ireland) [Stamps].
PUBLIC BILLS.—First Reading.—Innkeepers' Liability (No. 1) [Bill 18]; Municipal Elections [Bill 19].

QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce during the present Session any measure with a view to amend and improve the laws relating to the occupation and tenure of land in Ireland, and to insure to the tenant an adequate protection for his outlay of capital in improvements?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, it was not the intention of the Government to introduce any measure during the present Session upon the subject to which the hon. Member had referred, it being their opinion that the Bill of 1860 had effected a final settlement of the long-agitated question, and they did not feel disposed to reopen it.

COLLIERY ACCIDENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If, at any future coroners' inquests which may be held upon the sufferers by colliery accidents, the Government will authorize the attendance of a legal officer to watch the proceedings upon the part of the Crown?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Government did not propose to establish any general rule with that object. The great majority of colliery accidents did not require it, and in certain special cases practical mining engineers had been sent to attend the inquests.

CIRCUIT REGULATION COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he desired to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any steps in pursuance of the recommendations of the Circuit Regulation Commission, or in any way to alter the existing divisions of the Judges' Circuits?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it had not been thought necessary to make any change in the circuits generally. But it had been thought expedient that a change should be made with respect to the Northern Circuit, owing to the great amount of business connected with it, and measures were in contemplation with a view to a more equal distribution of business. The details of the arrangement were under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor, who was in communication with the Judges on the subject.

PRIVATE BILLS.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he had to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the reference to the Committee about to be appointed on Private Bill legislation will include the question of the expediency or otherwise of empowering Committees on Private Bills to award costs in certain cases?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that if it should please the House to appoint the Committee of which he had given notice, there would, he thought, be no doubt that the question of the awarding of costs would come within the scope of the order of reference.

INCLOSURE OF CROWN LANDS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he rose to move, as an Amendment, an Address to the Crown, with a view to the prevention of the enclosure of Crown lands within fifteen miles of the metropolis. Parliament had always looked with a jealous eye upon Bills for the enclosure of waste lands, so as to prevent, if possible, the enclosure of lands adjacent to the metropolis and to populous towns, which were so conducive to the health as well as recreation of the inhabitants. Formerly, while other Inclosure Bills were private Bills, Bills which sought to enclose lands within a certain distance of populous towns, were Bills of a public nature; but in consequence of the great expense involved in passing private Bills, all Inclosure Bills were made public Bills. The result was that the House ceased to have any information or warning when lands were sought to be enclosed within a certain distance of populous places. Lands coming under the head of Crown Lands had been enclosed in the case of Hainault Forest, by the 14 & 15 Vict., c. 43, and hon. Members had, he hoped, given their assent to the measure legalizing the enclosure rather because they were ignorant of what its effects would be than because they were insensible to the injury which it inflicted upon the poor people up to whose dwellings the forest extended. He had, he added, moved for certain Returns with a view, among other things, of ascertaining the extent of forest rights; and so long as those rights were respected Epping Forest would remain what it now was, a tract of land extending over 10,000 acres, and affording the means of recreation and the preservation of health to the inhabitants of the eastern portions of the metropolis. When he took into account the sums of money for which rights so valuable had been in several instances disposed of, he was, he confessed, not a little astonished at the extraordinary nature of the bargains which had been made. The return to which he alluded extended over five pages, but he would take only four cases to illustrate what had been done. He found that in 1856 the Crown rights over 1,891 acres of land were sold to Lord Wellesley for £1,891; in 1857 the rights over 325 acres to Messrs. Lambert and Dane for £1,353; while in 1858 the rights over 695 acres were sold for £3,349, and in 1860 the rights over 1,377 acres for £5,468—making a total of 2,832 acres sold for about £11,000. The House would, he thought, concur with him in thinking that amount a most inadequate compensation for the loss which the public experienced in being deprived of the privilege of enjoying themselves on those grounds. It should also be borne in mind that the land thus enclosed was situated in the immediate vicinity of those poor people in the north-east of London who, with the exception of Victoria Park, had not a single open space for recreation. From that circumstance, in conjunction with the fact that the population of London had between 1851 and 1861 increased eighteen per cent, or by 441,753 persons, he did not think he should be charged with having attached undue importance to the subject in having brought it under the notice of the House. He should like to know what would be the feeling of hon. Members if they heard that a portion of Richmond Park was to be filched away in the manner he had described. Recently, when a measure was proposed to enclose Hampstead Heath, it was loudly protested against, and yet it was only a recreation ground for the comparatively rich. With what indignation, then, ought they not to look upon the gradual encroachments on Hainault and Epping Forests, which were a source of health and a source of recreation for the densely-packed labouring classes of the metropolis? He would therefore conclude by moving as an Amendment—

MR. COX said, he rose to second the Motion. The reason why it had been possible for encroachments to be made upon the forests of Epping and Hainault during the last few years was, that at the time of the passing of the Copyhold Inclosure Bill it was provided that notices should be given to all private individuals interested in the land proposed to be enclosed; but no provision was contained in the Act which made it necessary that any notice should be given to persons who might have merely public rights. In the last Session, without any notice whatever being given to the public, a Bill was brought in by the Secretary of the Home Department to carry into effect a provisional order of the Inclosure Commissioners. It spoke of certain lands in the parish of Chigwell, in the county of Essex, and but for a constituent of his who lived at Chigwell, it would never have been discovered that it was proposed to deprive the public of the use of between 400 and 500 acres which they had enjoyed from time immemorial. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee, and so strong a case was made out, that a great part of the intended deprivation of the public was prevented. It was clear the Copyhold Inclosure Act, having been passed while Epping was still a forest, did not apply to it now that it had been disafforested, and more watchfulness ought to be exercised over the sales of land. The sales of these Crown rights, while adding but little to the revenue of the country, acted injuriously upon the interests of the public, and he therefore thought it was quite proper and right that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Peacocke) should be carried, and a stop put to the filching away of these lands from the people.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “an humble

Mr. Peacocke

Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that no sales to facilitate Inclosures be made of Crown Lands or Crown Forestal Rights, within fifteen miles of the Metropolis,”

—instead thereof.

MR. PEEL said, that although the Motion of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Peacocke) was in general terms, it appeared by his speech that it had reference exclusively to the Forest of Epping, and he did not know of any forest near London except Epping over which the Crown possessed forestal rights. Allusion had been made to Hainault Forest; but that was disafforested some years ago, when the Crown was awarded a separate estate, whereupon all its forestal interests came to an end. With regard to Epping Forest, he could not understand the hon. Gentleman dwelling on the supposed sacrifice of Crown property by the sale of the interest of the Crown over 3,000 or 4,000 acres for £10,000 or £11,000. The hon. Member must greatly overrate or misconceive the nature of the interest of the Crown in Epping Forest. The Crown did not possess any part of the soil of that Forest. The Forest belonged entirely to private persons, as lords of manors, and to those persons who had received grants from the lords of manors. The only interest possessed by the Crown was a simple forestal right of ranging deer over the lands. He need not say that such a right, so far as the revenue of the Crown was concerned, was not of the slightest value. There were no deer in the forest, and in the present state of things it would not be possible to make Epping a deer forest without the greatest inconvenience. The course which had been taken with regard to that right was clearly explained in a letter from Mr. Kennedy, the Commissioner of Woods, dated April, 1853, and published in the Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for that year. Mr. Kennedy said—

“I have always entertained, and still entertain, an opinion that if it were possible to disafforest Epping, to prevent subdivision by enclosure, and without cost to the Crown or the public to preserve it for the enjoyment of the public, it would be a desirable object; but, having regard to the great difficulties, I reluctantly come to the conclusion that the course indicated by the solicitors, that of bringing to sale the right of the Crown, is probably the only course which can practically be adopted; and if your Lordships should concur in the propriety of this course, I am of opinion that its adoption ought not to be delayed, as Epping Forest can only be a source of expense, and its present condition, social and economical, is in the highest degree unsatisfactory."

In consequence of that recommendation of the Commissioner of Woods, the Treasury sanctioned from time to time sales of the interest of the Crown in the land, and the Returns to which the hon. Gentleman had referred showed the extent to which these sales had been carried up to the present time. He might mention that in all cases the rights of the Crown were sold to the owners of the soil. The hon. Gentleman proposed that in future those sales should be discontinued, and he did so not from any desire to preserve the forestal rights of the Crown for the sake of their legitimate object, or from taking any interest in those forestal rights, but from a desire to preserve the forest in which the Crown rights existed not now over 9,000 acres, but over only about 2,500 acres, as an open forest for the use of the people. The course which the hon. Gentleman recommended should be taken was not fair either to the Crown or to the owners of the soil. Let him tell the hon. Gentleman that to attain his object it was not sufficient merely that the Crown should abstain from selling its rights, because the right of the Crown was simply to feed deer over the forest; and if that right was not exercised, it became obsolete. ["No, no!"] Practically, that was so. However that might be, the hon. Gentleman would admit that if the rights of the Crown were to be preserved, any invasion of them must be resisted; and the only mode by which the Crown could resist encroachments would be by taking proceedings in the Court of Exchequer. There were instances to show that proceedings of this kind were attended with very serious expense to the Crown. As regards the owners of the soil, the adoption of this measure would change the nature of the easement which the Crown had over the land, and would be an endeavour to use the forestal rights of the Crown as an instrument for converting the property of private persons into a public park. On these grounds he must oppose the adoption of this Address.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that in the course of the discussion on the inclosure of Chigwell Forest last year it was suggested, very reasonably, by the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Peacocke) that whenever a scheme received the sanction of the Inclosure Commissioners, dealing with a piece of land within fifteen miles of the metropolis or within specified distances of other large towns, the attention of the House ought to be specifically directed to the fact, in order that it might not in ignorance of the facts give its sanction to enclosures to which objections on these grounds could be brought. He accordingly wrote to the Inclosure Commissioners, requesting them in their Reports to call special attention to enclosures of this particular nature, and received a reply from them in July last, undertaking that this course would be followed on all future occasions. Under these circumstances, as long as the law remained in its present state, he thought it would be unwise to pledge the Crown to refuse its assent to what might actually be sanctioned by Parliament.

MR. BUXTON said, the importance of the subject was much greater than might be supposed; in fact, there were few questions more nearly affecting the happiness and welfare of a large share of the metropolitan population. He differed from the hon. Member in thinking that the whole of Epping Forest ought to be preserved; there were nearly 10,000 acres which might well be enclosed. The highest points should all be retained in the hands of the Government, but there was a vast extent of swampy ground which might be sold, and would prove of great value, if not for agricultural purposes, at least for building ground. The population of the Tower Hamlets exceeded 650,000, and consisted of persons whose whole lives were spent in arduous work, and who had no opportunity of obtaining change of country air except by going down to Epping Forest, as Victoria Park lay so far to the north-east that it was virtually inaccessible. Last year no less than 76,000 persons went down by excursion trains, in addition to multitudes who travelled by the ordinary trains at exceedingly moderate fares. Having lived for years near the main road to Epping Forest, he had seen thousands of conveyances going to and fro, and he knew no more delightful spectacle than to witness mechanics and hard-worked tradespeople enjoying the delightful air and scenery on Sundays, nearly always accompanied by their wives and families. The objection on the score of expense to the Crown would be removed by the course which he suggested, while the claims preferred on behalf of neighbouring proprietors were really not founded on reason, the properties they now held having been acquired subject to forestal rights existing for 800 years. The slight inconvenience to proprietors ought not to be put in the scale against the wonderful benefits to the population of East London. He hoped the Government would take up the subject, and prevent these natural parks from being destroyed.

MR. LOCKE said, it was obvious that if the Crown would only remain quiet and not part with its forestal rights, Epping Forest would not be closed, but the public and the inhabitants of the metropolis would continue to enjoy the privileges which had been theirs for centuries past. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury had said, that if the Crown declined to interfere, its rights would be lost. In that the hon. Gentleman was entirely wrong, for there came in the old principle of law, Nullum tempus occurrit legi. The rights of the Crown always exist, no matter what might be done by its subjects derogating from those rights. Therefore, what was asked was simply that the Crown should hold its hand, and that it would not disafforest any part of Epping Forest. The consequence would be, that the public would continue to enjoy their accustomed rights. Who were the proprietors of the forest? It was said the lords of the manor; but the lord of the manor was not the lord of the soil. He had the right of taking game and so forth over the wastes, but he could not plough the ground. He presumed that the forest was in the nature of a common, and that the inhabitants of the neighbourhood had the privilege of sending their cattle there to graze, beyond which everybody had a right to use the place for the purpose of recreation and enjoyment. He should give his support with the greatest satisfaction for the proposition of the hon. Member for Maldon; and, if he divided, should vote with him.

MR. AYRTON said, whenever a private Member attempted to bring forward a Motion affecting the public interests, he was sure to be told by some one in authority that he was wrong in the procedure he had adopted. But if the hon. Gentleman took any other course than that which he had followed, he would certainly have gone on a wildgoose chase. It was not competent to a private Member to introduce a Bill bearing upon such a question as that now before the House without obtaining the previous assent of the Crown. That was the only constitutional course. He hoped the Motion of the hon. Gentleman would be agreed to, and he thanked him for having introduced it, as in the hands of the metropolitan Members it might be made the occasion of imputations against them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I think it is desirable that the House should pay particular attention to the terms of the Motion. The Motion proposes, by a rule as rigid as the House can make it, to prevent the Crown from taking any steps by the sale of its forestal rights for permitting the enclosure of lands within fifteen miles of the metropolis. It is one question whether certain lands that are now open, and that are well adapted for the purpose, should continue open with a view to the recreation of the inhabitants of the environs of the metropolis; but I beg to observe to the House that it is quite another question whether the House should by an Address bind itself and the Crown to permit no sale of forestal rights whatever, and therefore to allow of no enclosure whatever, so far as they are concerned, within a radius of fifteen miles from the metropolis. If the hon. Member desires that the Crown should use a proper and careful discretion in parting with those rights, in order that those rights may not be parted with in a manner injurious to the comfort of the population, that is one thing. But what I ask the House is that they will leave it to the Crown to exercise that discretion in parting with those rights in cases where it can be done in justice to the local population—in cases where the proposal is on the part of the public at large to realize funds for the benefit of the State, and where those funds can be realized without any hardship to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. The question is not at all whether all these lands are to be enclosed and the public are to be excluded from that enjoyment of them which they have had hitherto, but whether all discretion is to be taken from the advisers of the Crown and a rigid rule is to be laid down that no matter how useless any portion of these lands may be to the people in the neighbourhood, and no matter how considerable a prize may by their sale be obtained for the benefit of the State, they shall not be sold because they are within a radius of fifteen miles of the metropolis.

MR. HENLEY said, that if he thought the proposition of his hon. Friend would do what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said it would do, he would not support it; but, on the contrary, he thought it would not have such effect. So far as he understood the thing it was this, that no subsequent dealing with the land in question should take place without the consent of the Crown, because the Crown having forestal rights, the Inclosure Commissioners would be very loath, and he believed it would be difficult in law for them to do it, to enclose such land without the consent of the Crown. The consequence would be, that if there were a proper case made out for enclosure, a case which could be defended in that House, the enclosure would take place, and the Crown would get its allotment in place of its right, and that allotment could be turned into money. There would, then, be the great security, that no dealing would take place in the locality referred to—a large portion of the land in which on all hands it was deemed desirable should be kept open—that no dealing with it should take place without the full consent of the Crown. That would be a great security. The right hon. Gentleman opposite shook his head, but he did not think the Inclosure Commissioners, or if they did that the House, would confirm it—frame a provisional order for enclosure without the consent of the Crown.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he could hardly agree with the right hon. Gentleman who had spoken last, for the proposal went to the extent of saying that no sales whatever should take place of forest land within fifteen miles of the metropolis. He would suggest that some qualifying words should be introduced, for he apprehended that what the House meant was, that no sale should take place where the land was for the benefit of the public, but that where the land was not for the benefit of the public it might be sold. But under the present wording it was clear that no sale could take place under any circumstances whatever.

MR. MALINS said, he heartily concurred in the general proposition of the hon. Member, that a considerable restriction should be placed on the alienation of waste land; still, he could not vote for the Motion as it stood. He agreed with the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton) that the Crown should exercise a discretion in this matter—that it should select certain spots to be kept open, but that other portions might be enclosed with advantage to everybody. He would suggest the withdrawal of the present Motion and that the hon. Member should reintroduce it in a modified form, so as to remove the objection now felt by many Members of the House to the proposition in its present form.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he hoped the hon. Member would not withdraw his Motion. If from past experience they could assume that any discretion would be exercised as to the lands to be enclosed, he would not recommend the hon. Gentleman to persevere. If he were not mistaken, no lands could be enclosed over which rights of common had been exercised for fifty or sixty years, unless by special Act of Parliament; and with regard to Epping Forest, those rights had been enjoyed. In addition, he believed that persons who purchased such lands did so with serious responsibility, because if those lands were parted with without the sanction of an Act of Parliament, the lands might be allotted within twenty years, and the purchasers might suffer. Therefore, upon every ground, whether as regarded the public or individual purchasers, he should support the Motion.

The House divided:—Ayes 73; Noes 113: Majority 40.

Resolved,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that no sales to facilitate Inclosures be made of Crown Lands or Crown Forestal Rights within fifteen miles of the Metropolis.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The House, according to Order, resolved itself into a Committee on Post Office and other Savings Banks.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-QUER: The object of my proposal that the House should go into Committee is to obtain a preliminary Resolution for the purpose of enabling me to bring in a Bill which relates to Post Office Savings Banks. It is a Bill which touches, it is true, in one or two particulars upon the powers of other savings banks, but simply in relation to the transactions between both classes of savings banks. Nothing whatever is done by it with respect to the management of the old savings banks, or the management of the funds held on behalf of the old savings banks. For that reason I propose that it should be called the Post Office Savings Banks Bill. The Resolution which I shall move shall be in conformity with the terms in which the Committee was appointed, and will be somewhat of a general character, and will not refer to some portions of the Bill. The Bill is a short and simple one, and I will state to the Committee in two or three minutes what will be the principal provisions of the Bill. At present there is no legal method of enabling old savings banks to wind up. A certain portion of them have expressed, and—so far as dependent upon the trustees and managers—have acted upon their desire to wind up. Now, I do not think that the provisions for enabling the old savings banks to be wound up are likely to be very extensively acted upon. We have had now some experience on this point; and though a considerable number of the old savings banks have done what in them lay to wind up their transactions and hand over their deposits to the Post Office savings banks, yet when we look at the number and degree of development which those savings banks have reached, the number which has done so is comparatively trifling. There are about 600 savings banks in the country, and of these between thirty and forty had desired to wind up their affairs. But the Committee will be able to judge what is the comparatively small scale of the transactions of the great bulk of those savings banks when I state that the average amount of deposits in those savings banks which have been desirous of winding up is only about £7,000; whereas the average of deposits in the remaining savings banks, nearly 600 in number, is nearly £70,000. The Committee, therefore, will see that what we have to provide for is not the likelihood of any general, sweeping, or rapid change from one class of savings banks to the other, but the desire which has been, perhaps naturally and reasonably, expressed by the managers of a certain portion of savings banks where their sphere of action has not been an extended one, to divest themselves of their labours and responsibility, and to hand over the whole of their cash and assets to the Post Office savings banks and the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, subject to all claims of depositors upon that cash and those assets. That is the principal legislative object of the Bill which I shall seek to introduce, if this Resolution is accepted by the House.

There is in view also another legislative object—one which involves more details—but its general purpose is this:—The law has very justly imposed somewhat stringent restraints upon the withdrawal of deposits lodged in savings banks on behalf of minors, especially of minors under seven years of age; and in some cases where the Legislature has not by any direct enactment taken that course, the same result has been brought about by laws which have from time to time been framed by the managers of the different savings banks, which have received the assent and approval of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and have thereby acquired the force of law. These restraints have placed the accounts of minors under seven years of age in such a position that a transfer of their accounts to the Post Office savings banks cannot upon any conditions be effected. Now, however desirable and wise it may be to impose stringent limitations upon the withdrawal of their deposits or upon dealing with their accounts while they are at that tender age, it is right that some means should be provided for allowing the transfer of their deposits by a transfer certificate to the Post Office savings banks. A great number of applications have been addressed to us by various parties—for instance, by trustees of existing savings banks and by the guardians of children—and representations have been made to us signifying the desire that those powers should be given, and the object is so obviously reasonable—though the mode of proceeding should be carefully considered—that I do not conceive there can be any difference of opinion on it. I have a number of letters containing such applications made to us. For example, in many cases the parents of children apply to have the accounts of their children transferred from the one savings bank to the other, but cannot effect it. I shall propose in the Bill that powers for this purpose shall be given, and that reciprocal powers shall also be given for transferring in like manner deposits from Post Office savings banks to the old savings banks whenever it may be desirable. The other important point contained in the Bill is one on which we propose the adoption of the following Resolution, namely:—

I will endeavour to explain briefly the object of this Resolution. It relates to a subject of great importance, though it deals within a very limited area. As far as my experience has gone, either in the office I have the honour to hold or elsewhere, there appears to me to be on the part of the Members of this House, and likewise on the part of the public, a very general desire to give further extension—indeed, a great further extension, if possible—to the principle which long has been introduced into our law, and the working of which, as far as it goes, is eminently salutary—I mean the principle and practice of converting the perpetual annuities, of which the National Debt mainly consists, into terminable annuities either for lives or for terms of years. The extent to which we are at present able to operate on that principle is as follows:—There are certain annuities existing which terminate in 1867; there are large annuities payable at the Bank of England, and there are certain other annuities, principally such as were created by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of War during the course of the late war with Russia. To those annuities so created by him there have been added during the two or three last years the annuities created on account of the Fortifications, and likewise a small amount of public annuities now in the market on account of the Red Sea Telegraph, which is, however, a very small amount indeed. Besides these particular annuities—which are public annuities, expiring at certain fixed dates—there is in operation a system by which, partly and mainly through the National Debt Office, and partially and to a limited degree through a portion of the savings banks of the country, annuities may be purchased on good terms by individuals either for their own lives, or for the lives of certain other persons, or for terms of years. That is the extent to which that system is carried, quite apart from the other annuities of which I have spoken, terminating in a lump, so to speak, at certain dates. It may be said roughly to amount to the conversion of about £1,000,000 of stock per annum. That is not a very large amount, and it is constantly asked why we do not operate more largely for the reduction of the National Debt by the conversion of perpetual into terminable annuities. The answer is, that annuities are a commodity that can be sold favourably in the market under certain circumstances, and to a certain extent, but they are a commodity of which the general market entirely refuses to receive more than a very limited quantity, except on terms so disadvantageous to the public that the Government would not recommend the operation, nor would Parliament be disposed to authorize it. But it appears to us there is a mode perfectly safe and simple by which we can give expansion to this valuable principle of converting perpetual into terminable annuities by operating on the funds that come into our hands in respect to the Post Office savings banks. I will not ask the Committee for an opinion, nor give an opinion on the part of the Government, respecting the application of the principle to the larger amount of public money which we hold on the part of the old savings banks. In dealing with the funds we must bear in mind—though it is a contingency unlikely to occur—that we might be compelled, in order to meet the claims of depositors, to go largely into the market as sellers of stock. It follows, therefore, that we must reserve in our own hands means ample enough to meet any such possible though not probable demand. Therefore I would not venture, small as comparatively are the funds held on account of Post Office savings banks—and it is almost certain from all indications that there will be an influx and not an efflux of money—to ask the House to take a general power for converting the whole of that property into annuities. What I propose to do is this—to convert the present annuities that are perpetual into new perpetual annuities of a lower denomination, and taking the difference between the value of the old denomination and the new one to convert that amount into terminable annuities. Suppose, for example, there is a sum of £100,000 3½ per cent stock; we propose to take powers to convert that £100,000 3½ per cent stock into £100,000 2½ per cent stock. The consequence will be that we shall always have a marketable commodity on hand; and 2½ per cent, in consequence of its very low denomination, is a stock that usually commands a very good price in the market. Then what becomes of the difference between the £2 10s. and the £3 10s. stock? That I propose to take powers to convert into terminable annuities. It seems that the sums held by the Post Office savings banks—though large considering the time the system has been in operation—are at present but very small. They amount to something between £1,500,000 and £2,000,000. Anything, therefore, that can be done at the present moment must be done on a small scale, but it is quite possible—at least I will not say it is unlikely—that as the deposits in those banks become larger, the scale on which the principle may be applied will become more extended. I hope the Committee will understand what the effect will be of the proposed operation. The principle of the Resolution I propose is that a limited power should be taken to convert perpetual annuities into terminable annuities. That may be done either by converting a portion entirely into terminable annuities, by converting the whole, or by converting part into perpetual annuities of a lower denomination than they now hold, and at the same time converting the difference between the lower and the higher denomination into a terminable annuity. The effect of the latter course will be that, without encountering the inconvenience of having to sell those terminable annuities in the general market, which is not adapted to receive them, we shall be able to act more extensively, and by adding by very gentle degrees to the present annual charge, borne on account of the interest of the debt, to gradually reduce the debt itself at a future period. Those annuities would, in point of fact, be very convenient to hold on the part of the Post Office savings banks, and eminently desirable securities, though not desirable securities to carry into the general market. That is the only explanation that I can offer at present in proposing a Resolution of this general character. Probably it is the desire of the Committee to see the Bill in print, and I shall be able to lay it on the table on the day after this Committee shall have reported. The mode in which the provisions I have sketched will be carried into effect will be quite plain. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving a Resolution as follows :—

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not quite understand the right hon. Gentleman on one point. Was it intended by the Bill to give the option of converting a portion into terminable annuities in either one or of both the ways mentioned ; or would the Bill prescribe which of the two ways were to be adopted ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that what he meant to have done was to describe the scope of the Resolutions. He asked the Committee to assent to the principle of conversion in some form. The form he thought to be the safest was that of converting into terminable annuities only the difference between the lower and the higher denominations. That, therefore, was the form in which he should propose to place it in the Bill ; but the other mode would be compatible with the principle of the Resolution.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he had more than once called attention to the extreme inconvenience of the House being called upon suddenly to express opinions on subjects which were certainly more or less complicated, but with which the right hon. Gentleman might be familiar. They had had only ten days' notice, and the notice was for a Committee on Post Office savings banks. True, the words “other savings banks” were introduced, and that was all there was to lead them to suppose that a measure might be introduced which would apply to the old savings banks. The scheme of the right hon. Gentleman might be good or bad, but it was one on which the Committee could give no opinion at that moment. Certainly no one would have guessed that the first measure relating to Post Office savings banks would be a provision to wind up the old savings banks. He was aware that there might be some small banks which might desire to avail themselves of such an opportunity ; but hon. Gentlemen would rather have liked to know that such a scheme was in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman. He should like to be informed whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed to give to the old savings banks whatever powers of transfer he meant to confer upon the Post Office savings banks. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER : Minus the accounts.] Of the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman in a financial point of view he should not say a word, although he thought it looked somewhat like a favorite scheme of his of trying to get $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent for $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent stock. Whatever, he might add, was the value of the terminable annuities, there was one difficulty connected with them, which was the operation of the income tax.

MR. AYRTON said, that if he had understood the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman aright, it was this—that £100 of 3 per cent stock would be converted into £100 $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent stock and a certain amount of terminable annuities, which would cease at a fixed date, when only the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent stock would be left. When the terminable annuity ceased, would not the capital of the Post Office savings banks be diminished to that extent ? How was the capital fund to be kept intact ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not think the hon. Gentleman had correctly gathered what would be the effect of this measure. They had entirely cleared off, in the case of the Post Office savings banks, those ambiguities which attached to the relations of the different parties concerned in the old savings banks. In the case of the Post Office savings banks there could be no doubt that both in law and in fact the State was simply a banker, stipulating to pay a certain fixed interest for the deposits of the public, and the public understood that the credit and the property of the country were their security for the due payment of that interest. That being the case, the public neither knew nor cared what was done with the money while it was in the hands of the Government; for if the system was an extravagant one, they did not suffer; and if, on the contrary, it was an economical and a wise one, they gained nothing. As to whether the Post Office savings bank system was a paying system, he should not enter into that question, as the materials for coming to a conclusion were not then before the House. But while not prepared to assert anything positively, he believed, and the very diligent and intelligent public officers who had been engaged in developing this system, fully believed, that those banks would not cost the country one shilling. Even supposing the case as put by the hon. Member, that there was a conversion into a perpetual stock of a lower denomination, which no doubt would be of less value in the market, the difference came to be this—that instead of receiving a fixed sum from year to year in perpetuity of a certain amount, they would receive two things: one, a fixed sum in perpetuity of a lower amount, and therefore representing a smaller capital; and the other, a circulating system which, from year to year, brought back portions of the capital, along with the annual interest. The portions of the capital so brought back, with other deposit monies, would be matter for annual re-investment; and that was the mode in which the system would work. It was highly important that the Post Office savings banks should be a self-supporting system; and he was very hopeful that it would be able to stand the test of the searching examination which the House would make in due time.

In reply to MR. WEGUELIN,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the process would be simply this—taking the smallest example of a particular annuity of £3 per cent, they would cancel that annuity and create in lieu of it a perpetual annuity of 50s. per cent, converting the other 10s. per centum into an annuity terminable at a fixed period, say, for example, 1885. With respect to the rate of interest, that was a question which the Government were constantly called upon to consider with regard to fortification and other annuities. Their regular practice was to consult the financial officers attached to the Government, and also the Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England; and there was never any difficulty as to the rate of interest, which was always made rather favourable to the purchaser than otherwise, and would therefore be favourable to the buyer of the annuity in the present case.

MR. HENLEY said, that it was not his intention to express any opinion upon the scheme, beyond that he understood the right hon. Gentleman to propose that there should be a certain number of perpetual annuities in the hands of the Post Office savings banks, but the House should remember that the sum of which he spoke would be still due to the country in hard money, though it would bear less interest. For his own part, he must say the scheme certainly seemed to him like paying the interest in two different ways, which was an odd method of reducing a debt.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved,

That it is expedient to amend the Law relating to Post Office Savings Banks, and to grant powers for the conversion of certain perpetual Government Annuities standing in the names of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, on account of Post Office Savings Banks, into certain other Stocks and Annuities.

Resolution to be reported on Monday next.

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to go into Committee on Customs Acts (Tobacco Duties) read.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether in reducing the duty on tobacco he would allow a drawback to merchants who had paid duty on stock in hand? They had heard already of the inconvenience of sudden changes. He did not wish to make any remarks about the reduction itself; but those interested, who had just paid a large amount of duty, had some grounds to complain of the suddenness of the reduction. On former occasions, when such changes had been made, large amounts had been remitted, both in respect of wine duties and hop duties; and whilst the amount of tobacco duties paid within the last few days could not be of much importance to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the sums were serious items to the merchants, on whose behalf he asked the question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that in accordance with a rule which had applied to the reductions of Customs duties for the last nineteen years, and from which there had during that time been no deviation, it was not the intention of the Government to propose the allowance of any drawback in respect of the duty paid upon the importation of manufactured tobacco. If they were to do so, they would depart from an established principle, and involve themselves in the greatest inconvenience.

House in Committee according to Order.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Resolutions which he was about to move had been laid upon the table, and had, in conformity with recent practice, been printed. With regard to the first of those Resolutions he wished to say that he placed it upon the paper rather for the information of the House and the public than because there was any necessity for so doing. It had been found convenient in the case of reduction of duty, in order to avoid too great suddenness of procedure, to print at the very first stage of the business the rate to which it was proposed to reduce the duty; but, inasmuch as the duties mentioned in the first Resolution were all of them lower than the existing ones, it would have been perfectly competent for him or any other Member of the House to have at once introduced a Bill to substitute them for those now in force. The Resolution was not one which would take immediate effect; on the contrary, it was a matter with regard to which it was desirable that full time should be given to the House and the trade for the consideration of the subject. The question of the duties upon manufactured tobacco was a very singular one. At present they gave what was called a monopoly to the home manufacturer; that was to say, that with the exception of certain articles which were purely articles of luxury, and could afford to pay the high duty, the duty was such as to amount to a total exclusion of foreign competition. Therefore, the duties upon manufactured tobacco as they stood, might be said to constitute the only relic of the system which was once the ruling principle of our tariff. It might, perhaps, seem strange that these duties should, for such a length of time, have escaped revision. They had not been maintained on account of any conviction on the part of this, or, as far as he knew, of any Government, that considerations of justice to the tobacco manufacturers required their maintenance. On the contrary, the obvious dictates of justice would appear, at least presumably, to be that the trade in manufactured tobacco and in manufacturing tobacco, should be placed upon the same footing as all other manufactures in this country—that was to say, that they should upon as fair a footing as they could devise, be subjected to competition with the producers of other nations. The reason why no proposal had up to that time been made to reduce the duty upon manufactured tobacco had been the grave nature of the difficulties which had to be encountered in securing the interests of the revenue. It was only after a very mature and careful consideration of the regulations proper to be adopted that the Government had at length been able to arrive at what they thought a solution of the difficulty, and to propose to the House the removal of what stood at present as a very gross and in principle a very indefensible anomaly in the tariff. One portion of the regulations involved a system of manufacturing certain descriptions of tobacco in bond—"Cavendish or Negro-head,"—and that was the enactment the nature of which had required him, instead of coming before the House with a Bill which would, perhaps, have been more for the general convenience, to proceed by way of preliminary Resolution. The Resolutions could not be understood except in connection with the provisions of the Bill, and particularly the bonding provisions. As far as he was aware, it appeared to be the general feeling of the trade that it was not possible longer to maintain the duties which were now in force. He did not at that time ask the Committee to do more than to assent to the general principle that those prohibitory duties, as he might call them, should be reduced. When they came to consider the particular kind of reduction, they were involved in mysteries of a trade very difficult to understand ; but he might say in general terms that they had thought it necessary to adopt a peculiar system with regard to a kind of tobacco that was called Cavendish or Negro-head. That was a description of tobacco which was very popular in some parts of the country, and which formed a considerable portion of that which was at present smuggled. The Government had, therefore, had to ask themselves whether in endeavouring to get rid of the prohibitory rate, and substituting a duty which would admit of the introduction of that article from abroad, they should allow our manufacturers the free use of duty-paid materials without supervision for the purpose of making cavendish or negro-head. Unfortunately, though, as he had said, the present duties had the effect of giving a monopoly to the home producer, in this one not unimportant point they gave a monopoly to the foreign producer, because the preparation of sweetened cavendish or negro-head was forbidden to the manufacturer at home. Its importation from abroad was likewise forbidden, but there the prohibition did not take practical effect, and a considerable quantity of this tobacco found its way into consumption. They had, therefore, thought it essential, in endeavouring to get rid of smuggling, and to establish a fair rate of duty, to attempt to afford to the British manufacturer some means of entering into this competition which he did not now enjoy. There were two modes which might have been adopted—one the free use of duty-paid articles, and the other the power to work on bond. The first of these was upon general grounds the more desirable ; but he was bound to say, that after consulting fully with the authorities of the Revenue Department, he could not satisfy his mind, nor could those who advised him satisfy their minds, that they could establish enactments permitting the use of duty-paid leaf tobacco for the purpose of manufacturing cavendish or negro-head without very serious danger to an important branch of the revenue. On that account he proposed, as far as that description of manufacture was concerned, to establish a system of manufacture in bond. With a regard to other descriptions of tobacco, roll tobacco of all descriptions, cut or shag tobacco, cigars, and snuff, the manufacture would continue to go on as at present. The manufacturer would continue to use duty-paid materials, and the only difference would be that the foreign article would be introduced at a rate of duty which, as the Government thought, would amount to a fair and full equivalent for both the direct and the indirect charge to which the British manufacturer was subject. Such was a very general outline of the principles of the measure which he proposed to introduce, the reasons for which did not require to be dilated upon. They were these three. In the first place, the Government aimed at applying to the manufacture of tobacco the principle of competition—competition from abroad as well as at home—which had been applied with such salutary effect to all other manufactures. In the second place, they hoped to effect a diminution of smuggling ; and in the third place—though that was not the main object of the proposal, and the Government were not prepared to submit any particular estimate—they believed the results would without doubt be of a beneficial character to the revenue. He hoped he had said enough to recommend that general outline of the measure to the adoption of the Committee, and all that he then asked was a provisional assent for the purpose of enabling him to introduce the Bill. He begged it might be well understood that no practical effect upon the duties would result from passing the Resolution that night ; the consideration of the Bill in Committee was the period when they would really have to settle the amount of the duties. Although he did not apprehend that any would be required, he held himself at liberty to introduce such modifications as might hereafter prove to be necessary into the proposal he had now submitted on the part of the Government. It had not been possible to have the advantage of free and direct communication with the trade before introducing the Resolution ; but before the final assent of the House was asked to the scheme, the opinions of the trade would be fully and directly elicited. The right hon. Gentleman then moved the following Resolutions :—

Segars	the lb.	5 0
Snuff	the lb.	3 9
Other Manufactured Tobacco .	the lb.	4 0

That Unmanufactured Tobacco warehoused in any warehouse approved for security of Duties of Customs may, in such warehouse, be manufactured or converted into the articles denominated Cavendish or Negro-head Tobacco; and upon every pound thereof produced by such manufacture or conversion there shall be charged and paid on the delivery thereof for home consumption the Customs Duty of . . . 3s. 8d.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that so far as he understood, the tobacco trade did not claim to be exempt from the principle of unrestricted competition applying to all other manufactures; but they felt that the change contemplated by the right hon. Gentleman placed them, in some respects, in an unfair position. They had to pay duty upon the tobacco in a damp state which was imported for the manufacture of cigars, and therefore weighed more than when it was dry, and they had also to pay duty upon stalks which were not used, and were mere refuse. They were thus placed at considerable disadvantage towards the foreign manufacturers, who were at liberty to use only the most favourable portions of the leaf. Under these circumstances, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would allow cigars, as well as cavendish and negro-head, to be made in bond. There was no argument in favour of the regulation in the one case which did not apply with equal force in the other, and therefore he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would apply the same rule to both.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he had received numerous representations from his constituents on the subject of these Resolutions. But as the right hon. Gentleman was not disposed to press them forward unduly or without listening patiently to the representations of the trade, he thought they might rest satisfied that no improper interference with their interests was intended. As no drawback was to be allowed, he hoped sufficient time would be afforded to the traders for working off the stocks they now had in hand before the Resolutions were put in force.

MR. AYRTON said, he had been beset with representations from his constituents, among whom were some thousands of persons engaged in the manufacture of cigars and tobacco, to the effect that the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not based on an accurate appreciation of the circumstances of the manufacture, and was likely to bring great distress and ruin on a large body of persons. No doubt, these cries of apprehended ruin were very general when ever changes were proposed, but experience showed that these cries were not always raised without substantial cause. It was to be regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, through the occurrence of circumstances of a painful nature, had not the opportunity of penetrating the mysteries of the tobacco trade before he brought forward his Resolutions. It was idle to talk of the tobacco manufacture coming within the principles of free trade, seeing it was an established law in this country that nobody was to grow tobacco. The tobacco manufacture and the duties imposed upon it were, according to the view which might be taken of smoking, either a vehicle for getting money out of the pockets of foolish men, or else a fine on the enjoyment of a luxury. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had moved these Resolutions with certain qualifications, and he now asked the House to suspend its judgment with regard to them. The leading manufacturers of tobacco were satisfied that the right hon. Gentleman had been misinformed; they knew the extent of the error under which he was labouring, and they were prepared to clear it up, and, if necessary, to go before a Select Committee. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer made any change in the existing laws with regard to tobacco, he would have to make many others; and he might find it impossible to maintain the superstructure of Customs regulations in relation to that article.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he was always glad to welcome a reduction of taxation, but there were many other articles upon which a reduction of duty would have been attended with greater benefits. For instance, he wished the right hon. Gentleman, instead of lessening the duty on cigars, had reduced that upon unmanufactured tobacco. It could scarcely be credited that the duty on cigars consumed by the wealthier classes of society was 35 per cent, while that on unmanufactured tobacco, consumed by the great mass of the population, was nearly 500 per cent.

MR. LOCKE said, he regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had passed by entirely the question of reducing the duty on the tobacco consumed by the working classes, to whom it had now become an absolute necessity, as most of them smoked and not a few chewed. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would consider the expediency of reducing the duty on unmanufactured tobacco. The effect of the heavy duty was that it was brought in in the very lightest form. It was then watered and sugared and adulterated in all sorts of ways, and all of it could be bought for less than the duty. He was convinced that by reducing the duty on the unmanufactured article the revenue would be largely benefited, and adulteration would be checked.

Mr. ROEBUCK observed, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared to be in a dilemma, for, while one side urged him to consider the case of the cigar-smokers, another urged upon him the case of the consumers of unmanufactured tobacco. For his part, he had no sympathy with either one side or the other; and he heartily wished there was no tobacco grown in the world.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he considered, that as the question had been raised, there should be no delay in its settlement, lest the revenue should suffer; for if there was a prospect of the duty on cigars being diminished, nobody would be in a hurry to take them out of bond. He wished, therefore, to ask his right hon. Friend for explanation as to what the usual course was when the Committee had passed a Resolution that certain duties should be levied and no time was fixed. He (Sir Stafford Northcote) did not see why the Chancellor of the Exchequer should not have consulted the trade before he brought forward these Resolutions; the only reason, perhaps, why his right hon. Friend had not done so was that he wished to submit the matter first to the House of Commons, though it was difficult to see the use of attempting to keep the matter secret. He trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take care to provide such arrangements that the revenue should not be diminished. There was another point on which he should like some explanation—he meant the reasons why the Chancellor of the Exchequer objected to the same privilege being granted to the cigar-maker as to the manufacturer of cavendish or negro-head tobacco, of manufacturing in bond. He wanted to know why, if the privilege were given to the one class of manufacturers, it should be withheld from the other? It would be a great advantage to the revenue as well as to the manufacturers, if the extension of the privilege were granted. If there were any special objections, the Committee ought to be told what they were. He should like to know whether the Government had authoritatively decided upon the subject.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the points raised during the conversation on the subject he had introduced called for but a few observations from him. He had listened with great regret to the speech of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton). The hon. Gentleman had shown the cloven foot at once, and it was obvious that his idea was that the present duties should be retained in force. With reference to his statement that there already existed free competition between the tobacco manufacturers of this country, he would only say that when the monopoly in corn was attacked, they were told that there was free competition between agriculturists. The day for fighting that battle had passed away. The hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) said that a reduction of the duty on unmanufactured tobacco would be followed by an increase of revenue. That, however, was one of the largest questions of revenue which could be raised, and could hardly be dealt with in a measure such as this, which was a mere measure of trade. Reduction of duty and increase of revenue did not invariably go together; and, from the inquiries he had made on the subject, he was convinced that any material reduction of the duty on unmanufactured tobacco would lead to a very large reduction of revenue. Practically, the question which the Committee would have to consider, would be whether they would select that article in preference to other articles. Those selected would, he believed, yield additional revenue, and, to a great extent, prevent smuggling. With reference to the possible loss of duty from the circumstance that no date was named from which the reduction would take effect, he believed that vast as were the payments on unmanufactured tobacco, the payments on manufactured tobacco were extremely small, and a week or a fortnight was of very little consequence. The effect of naming no specific time in the Resolution was that a Bill similar in form would be introduced, and the reduction would take place only when the Royal assent was given to the Bill. It was desirable that they should not proceed with precipitancy; but at the same time they ought to deal with the proposition without undue delay. With regard to the manufacturers, he merely desired to give them such time as might be necessary to enable them to bring their views fully before the Government and the House. He should himself think that a very short time would suffice for that purpose; and if the House went into Committee upon the Bill in a fortnight, they might within that period very well dispose of all the questions that might be raised. Then there was the practical question put by his hon. Friend as to the manufacture of cigars in bond. It must be borne in mind that the manufacture in bond was at best a very defective, clumsy, and costly expedient. It was, however, better sometimes to permit such manufacture than to prohibit the trade altogether; but the privilege given to manufacturers was attended by various drawbacks. The enjoyment of it was absolutely limited to a very few spots where the customs had considerable establishments which enabled them to conduct the necessary supervision. The opinion of the Government was that there was no sufficient reason for granting power to manufacture cigars in bond; but when he was asked whether that was an irrevocable opinion and was an essential part of the proposition, most certainly he thought that all such matters were perfectly open for discussion. The considerations by which they were guided were considerations in which all took a common interest—namely, a desire to reconcile as well as they could the several interests of the consumer, the manufacturer, and the revenue. Therefore, he held himself entirely open to examine further the extension of the bonding privilege to other places than he had named; but he was bound to say, that as far as his investigations had hitherto gone, he was not aware of any sufficient reasons why it should be so extended.

1. Resolved,

	s.	d.
Segars	the lb.	5 0
Snuff	the lb.	3 9
Other Manufactured Tobacco .	the lb.	4 0

2. Resolved,

That Unmanufactured Tobacco warehoused in any warehouse approved for security of Duties of Customs may, in such warehouse, be manufactured or converted into the articles denominated Cavendish or Negro-head Tobacco; and upon every pound thereof produced by such manufacture or conversion there shall be charged and paid on the delivery thereof for home consumption the Customs Duty of 3s. 8d.

DRAINAGE (IRELAND) [STAMPS].

Drainage (Ireland) [Stamps], — considered in Committee:—

(In the Committee.)

Resolved,

That every Debenture granted under the provisions of any Act of the present Session relating to the Drainage of Land in Ireland, and every Assignment and Transfer thereof, shall be chargeable with the Stamp Duty as a Bond for the like amount, and the Assignment and Transfer thereof, are by the Laws in force subject or liable to respectively.

INNKEEPERS' LIABILITY.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. P. W. MARTIN said, he rose to move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Law respecting the Liability of Innkeepers, and to prevent certain frauds upon them. As he did not anticipate any opposition to the Motion, he would content himself by saying that the object of the measure was to deal with a serious and growing fraud upon that class of persons.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. WYKEHAM MARTIN, Mr. GRANT DUFF, and Mr. HUNT.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he wished to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the mode of taking Votes at Municipal Elections. The object of the measure was to remedy an increasing evil which was experienced at these elections throughout the country.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. AUGUSTUS SMITH, Mr. COX, and Mr. DILLWYN.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 19.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Seven o'clock till Monday next.

*Monday, February 16, 1863.*MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a—English Church Services in Wales [H.L.], (No 7.)

PUBLIC BUSINESS—BRAZIL.

THE EARL OF DERBY : A night or two ago a noble Friend of mine (the Earl of Powis) asked the noble Earl the President of the Council, what measures would be brought forward in this House before Easter. The noble Earl was not then in a position to give a definite answer, but he promised that in a short time he would give a list of those important measures—dimly shadowed forth in the Royal Speech—which were likely to occupy the attention of this House before Easter. I should not venture to press such a question if there appeared to be any preparation making, but I will make a much more modest inquiry. I will ask whether it is the intention of the Government to bring forward any measures in this House either before or after Easter? If the President of the Council would give us the slightest indication of the measures which are likely to come before us, it would be much to the convenience of your Lordships, who come down night after night for the purpose of doing nothing. If the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had been in his place, I would also have asked him how soon we are likely to see the papers connected with recent affairs in Brazil, which very deservedly and very necessarily have excited a great deal of public attention. In the noble Earl's absence, I will not ask the Government for any expression of opinion on the subject; but I hope that when the papers are produced, the Government will be able to confute the impression which has been raised by the papers published by the Brazilian Government—that in the course he has pursued, in the demands he has made, in the manner of making them, and in the means employed to enforce them, Mr. Christie, our Minister, has acted under their authority and instructions. I hope the Government will be able to show that that is not the case; for certainly more unjustifiable proceedings never were taken by any representative of the Crown against a friendly Government than appear to have been taken by Mr. Christie, and I trust we shall hear that they have been disapproved by Her Majesty's Government.

EARL GRANVILLE : I am afraid it is not at all a novel thing for your Lordships to be without much business at this period of the Session, and it certainly is not anything to be wondered at. I think I have heard the noble Earl himself lament the same fact, and state how great were the difficulties in introducing measures in your Lordships' House so early in the Session. My noble Friend near me (Lord Stanley of Alderley) has a Bill prepared on a subject in which the noble Earl himself took great interest last Session—the prevention of the pollution of rivers by noxious gases and other chemical ingredients, and it will be brought forward immediately. With regard to the papers inquired for by the noble Earl, the Foreign Secretary is not present, but I know that they are in course of preparation, and will be laid before Parliament immediately.

THE EARL OF DERBY was glad to hear that it was intended to bring forward a Bill on this subject; but he wished to know whether it was intended to carry out all the recommendations of the Committee over which he had the honour to preside? It appeared from the noble Earl's statement that it was confined only to the injury done to rivers by noxious gases, although the evidence taken before the Committee last year referred in a great measure to the injury done to the surrounding country by noxious vapours.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that the Bill was limited to alkali works. It had been shown last year that it would be easy to provide a remedy against their evil effects, and the proprietors generally were not indisposed to accept regulations for the purpose.

THE EARL OF DERBY recommended that the Government should take into their consideration the general state of the law of nuisances, which had been shown to be very conflicting, and which greatly required amendment and consolidation.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, the Bill was confined to the questions submitted to the Committee of last year.

MADRAS IRRIGATION COMPANY.

QUESTION.

MR. SMOLLETT asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has made any further concessions or given a guarantee for further interest on the capital of the Madras Irrigation Company, beyond the sum of one million sterling, to which the guarantee of interest was previously limited; and whether he would be prepared to produce all the Papers and Correspondence explanatory of the Government connection with this Joint Stock Company?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in answer to the first Question put by the hon. Gentleman, he had to inform him that nothing definitive had as yet been done on the subject. Proposals had been made, and negotiations were going on with the Company. The whole question, however, was referred to the Government of Madras, and until they had pronounced their opinion upon the matter nothing final would be done. When the Correspondence was completed, he should have no objection to produce all the papers relating to it.

THE QUEEN'S PRISON, SOUTHWARK.

QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is intended to convert the Queen's Bench Prison into a Military Prison; and, if not, what were the intentions of the Government with respect to the site of that building?

MR. COWPER said, that when the Queen's Prison was discontinued as a prison for debtors, the Government had to consider what use they could make of the building, and it seemed the most convenient and economical course to use it as a military prison. The building was accordingly given over for that purpose to the War Department at the close of last year.

FIRES IN THE METROPOLIS.

QUESTION.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is prepared to bring in a Bill for the better protection of life and property against Fires in the Metropolis; and, if so, when he will introduce it?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that he did intend to bring in a measure for that purpose, but it would not be its object to put an end to the present system, as suggested by the Committee of last year; the object would be rather to strengthen and enlarge the present system, so as to render it commensurate with the wants of the metropolis. He could not say when he should be able to bring in the Bill, as he was now in communication with the different bodies whose concurrence would be necessary to the success of the scheme.

CHURCH RATES.

QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the Government intend to bring in a Bill on the subject of Church Rates this Session?

SIR GEORGE GREY: The Government have no Bill which they are at present prepared to lay before the House upon that subject.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any information, official or otherwise, has reached the Foreign Office to the effect that the Russian diplomatic authorities in China have entered into arrangements with the Tartar Government to aid in taking the cities of Nankin, Soochow, and Hangchow, on condition of having ceded to the Russian Government Chusan and the adjacent islands in the mouth of the Yangtse-Kiang; whether the Tantai of Ningpo has issued a Proclamation announcing that barracks were to be prepared for 2,000 Russian troops at Ningpo; whether it is true that the French are appropriating land at Ningpo; are raising a body of Chinese troops under French officers; and whether the Customs Duties at Ningpo are being collected by an officer in the French Navy?

MR. LAYARD said, that with respect to the first part of the inquiry, reports had reached Her Majesty's Government of the nature to which the hon. and gallant Member had referred; but they had no reason to believe that they were true. As regarded the French, he believed the French officers had been employed in disciplining Chinese troops, but he was not aware that they were raising any special bodies under the command of French officers, nor was he aware that barracks were being prepared at Ningpo; and as regarded the employment of a French officer in collecting the customs duties at Ningpo, there were no doubt Frenchmen as there were men of other nations, employed by the Chinese in the collection of the customs.

AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND POSTAL SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any Correspondence has passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Colonial Governments of Australia and New Zealand respecting a new Postal Service between those Colonies and the Mother Country via Panama; and, if so, whether there is any objection to lay such Correspondence on the table of the House?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, there had been no correspondence up to that date worth laying before the House. The Legislature of New Zealand had passed an Act for the establishment of postal communication with this country by way of Panama, and the Postmaster General of New Zealand was now in this country for the purpose, among others, of forwarding that object. The Legislature of Victoria, however, had declined to be a party to the scheme.

ILLEGITIMATE CHILDREN (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 13.]—COMMITTEE.

Clause 1 (Tenth Section of recited Act repealed).

MR. HASSARD said, the clause as it stood might have the effect of putting an end to all appeals now pending, and suggested the addition of some words to amend this.

MR. MAGUIRE asked the hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland why he did not propose to assimilate the law in this matter to that of England. In this country the jurisdiction was given to the petty sessions, and was not confined, as this Bill proposed it should be in Ireland, to the quarter sessions. He (Mr. Maguire) could not understand why this should be so.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill of last year proposed to give jurisdiction to the petty sessions, but the House would not entertain the proposal. The noble Lord the Member for Mayo (Lord John Browne), during the passage of the Bill through Committee introduced a clause—Boards of Guardians to recover from the putative Father the cost of Maintenance of an Illegitimate Child up to the age of Fourteen, by Process before the Barrister at Quarter Sessions. The House entirely adopted that principle, and by a majority of 111 to 11. The Government, therefore, had no option but to adopt the principle of that clause. Great inconvenience might arise if the guardians, in seeking to recover money for the maintenance of women and their illegitimate children, should have to go before the magistrates in petty sessions, because those magistrates were almost always members of the boards of guardians, and therefore would be judges in their own cause. In consequence of this point being raised on Friday, he had written to one of the Law Officers of the Crown, Mr. Sergeant Sullivan, on the subject, and he replied that it would be infinitely preferable to intrust this business to the Bar riater at Quarter Sessions, and that to give it to the petty sessions would be liable to great objection.

COLONEL DICKSON said, it was natural that a Law Officer of the Crown should prefer the jurisdiction of the quarter sessions. This was just a portion of that system of centralization which was growing up, which was taking the Irish county business out of the hands of the county gentlemen. He did not see that there could be any grievance in leaving this jurisdiction to the magistrates in petty sessions. Surely the right hon. Baronet did not pretend that the magistrates would suffer themselves to be biased in the judgments by their connection with the board of guardians. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would see his way to adopt the general opinion of the Irish Members unconnected with Government, and allow these cases to be decided by the petty sessions.

MR. BUTT pointed out that in those cases where the magistrates were members of the board of guardians they could not sit in the adjudication of these cases. He did not say that a magistrate in this position was morally disqualified; but he said without hesitation that he was legally disqualified, because the law prohibited any man from sitting on a case in which he was a party.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he believed that justice would be best secured by the clause in its present shape.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he looked upon it as most objectionable. If evidence were adduced that the woman spoke falsely, it would be very unfair to put the man whom she accused to the expense of a trial before the barrister.

MR. MONSELL said, that he was one of the eleven Members who originally voted against the clause. He was of opinion that the greater the publicity the greater the check to immorality. For that reason it was better that the case should be brought before the quarter rather than the petty sessions.

MR. LONGFIELD thought the jurisdiction should be in the barristers at quarter sessions, and that the magistrates at petty sessions should be restricted merely to the administration of the formal oath that would be required in order to institute proceedings.

MR. BAGWELL was of opinion that the magistrates should be kept out of the business altogether, otherwise the clause would be entirely inoperative.

MR. HASSARD said, he hoped the right hon. Baronet would persevere with the Bill as it stood.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he thought the better way would be to leave the matter entirely to the Chairman of quarter sessions. The magistrates who took part in the petty sessions were almost invariably most active in the board-room of the workhouse; and therefore, when on the bench, it was not right that they should adjudicate on matters which they had already discussed as guardians of the poor.

MR. GEORGE felt some surprise at having heard so many hon. Members express the opinion that the best tribunal for trying these cases in the first instance was the Assistant Barrister. On the contrary, a very strong opinion prevailed in Ireland that the best tribunal in the first instance would be the petty sessions of the place where the mother resided. He considered that unless a power was given to the magistrates at petty sessions to summon the woman before them to be examined on oath whether a certain individual was the father of her illegitimate child, the Act would to some extent be inoperative.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON expressed his hope that before the Bill passed it would be restored to the shape in which it appeared last Session, in respect to the tribunal before which the cases to which it referred would be tried. What he desired was that the English law, which left such cases to be heard at petty sessions, should be adopted for Ireland.

After a short discussion, Clause agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 2 (Board of Guardians may recover Cost of Maintenance of Illegitimate Child).

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he understood from his right hon. Friend who had charge of the Bill that he proposed this change of the law in consequence of a wish expressed to that effect last Session and the year before by Irish Members. This clause would to a great extent bring back the law of Ireland to the state in which the law of England was before 1844. Before that year the law of England empowered overseers to proceed against the putative father of an illegitimate child for the purpose of recovering from him the cost of its maintenance. The result was, that altercations constantly took place between boards of guardians and the puta-tive fathers of illegitimate children, and marriages frequently took place with the mothers of such children in consequence of the pressure applied by the parish officers. To remove the evils generated by that state of the law, the Government of the day, through Sir James Graham as Home Secretary, proposed an alteration by which all power of proceeding against a putative father on behalf of the parish was taken away, and any proceeding on their part in such matters was absolutely interdicted, and a remedy was given to the mother of an illegitimate child to proceed against the putative father for contribution towards its maintenance; but if the mother of the child became chargeable to the parish, the parish had no remedy. He was not aware that any complaint had been made of that alteration in the English law. On the contrary, he believed the boards of guardians in this country unanimously attested that the change was beneficial, and had removed the scandals and inconveniences created by the previous state of the law. He would suggest to the Irish Members that instead of adopting for Ireland the law as it existed in England before 1844, they should adopt the law as it now existed.

MR. BUTT said, the right hon. Gentleman misapprehended the object of this Bill, which was simply to remove some technical difficulties in the working of the Act of last Session. The question referred to by the right hon. Gentleman was discussed by the House last year, and it was resolved by a majority of ten to one that the power of suing should be given not to the mother, but to the board of guardians. He (Mr. Butt) was disposed to abide by that determination. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) had said that the board of guardians could not compel the mother to inform against the father, but the Assistant Barrister had the power of summoning her as a witness. It was true that she might refuse to make an affidavit, but in that case the board of guardians had a remedy—namely, that of depriving her of parochial relief.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he should be sorry to see the existing English law introduced into Ireland.

MR. BRADY declared, that the clause, if passed, would be the source of great immorality.

Sir George Lewis

Clause 3 (Petty Sessions Clerk shall furnish to Board of Guardians, or putative Father, Copy of Information; such Copy to be received in Evidence).

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Civil Bill to be heard by Chairman of Quarter Sessions).

LORD JOHN BROWNE moved to add the following words:—

"When any person shall once be adjudged to be the father of an illegitimate child, it shall not be necessary to swear informations or prove his paternity a second time when the guardians shall have to proceed against him to recover the costs of maintaining the same child."

MR. GEORGE said, that the Bill would involve great expense if proceedings were to be taken from week to week, or from month to month. In England, when an order was once made, it was a continuing order.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that on the Report he would bring up a clause to meet the last objection, and also to effect the object of the proposed addition.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses and Preamble agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

THAMES EMBANKMENT (NORTH SIDE) BILL.—LEAVE—FIRST READING.

MR. COWPER rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to authorize the formation of a new street from Blackfriars to the Mansion House, in connection with the Embankment on the Northern Side of the Thames. This street was intended to complete the great thoroughfare from east to west, commenced under the Act of last year, which was the most urgent need of the metropolis at the present moment. Notwithstanding the great increase of streets, the Strand still remained the single great thoroughfare between the City of London and the City of Westminster. All the traffic from Charing Cross by the Strand, and all from the north-west of London by Oxford Street and Holborn, met, in going eastward, at Cheapside, and obstructed that narrow pass. Cheapside was wholly inadequate for proper communication between the east and west of London. What was absolutely required was another thoroughfare between the open space in front of the Mansion House and the two centres of West End movement at Charing Cross and Westminster Hall. The street which had been laid out with a view to make this new thoroughfare was submitted last year to the House in a measure which he introduced—the Thames Embankment Bill. The Committee to which it was referred had not time to consider in detail the objections that might be raised to this portion of the scheme; and it was postponed until the present year. But a good deal of attention had been paid to it during the recess, not only by himself, but also by a Royal Commission, who had examined witnesses on the question whether some other communication between the east and west of London might not be more advantageously adopted. The Commission had reported in favour of the street he had the honour to propose last year, and decided that no alternative line was preferable to it. The first alternative line was to carry the embankment still further from Blackfriars to the east. The Bill passed last year provided for a spacious thoroughfare between Westminster Bridge and Blackfriars, with thirteen acres of garden-ground for the recreation of the inhabitants; but, as a thoroughfare, it would be of little use if it stopped at Blackfriars Bridge. The question then arose, could the embankment be prolonged eastward? The wharves below Blackfriars Bridge had commercial traffic of the greatest importance and very large compensation would be required if they were destroyed. The business carried on at these wharves was so important to the commerce of the City of London that it would be a serious misfortune to the City to be deprived of those wharves. Besides, a road carried in that direction would not go straight to the centre of the City, but would be circuitous. It would go first in an easterly direction to Queenhithe, where it would leave the river and proceed in a northern direction towards the Mansion House. Even if a lofty viaduct were adopted instead of a solid embankment, the compensation would be great, and the works costly. It was capable of being shown to any impartial inquirer that there would be no advantage in adopting the embankment in preference to a more direct line; and although, as a modification of their plan, they might have a viaduct that would permit barges to reach the wharves, the damage done and the compensation required would be very considerable, while the architectural effect would not be good. The other alternative was a line proceeding direct to St. Paul's; it was one which he greatly desired, because it would have that most desired effect of opening up the Cathedral to clearer view. It was a misfortune that that splendid work of art, the handsomest church of its style, was so little seen; and if the new street could be brought straight from Blackfriars Bridge, having the dome of St. Paul's in the vista, it would be a striking improvement. But the ascent of that street would be inconvenient, as St. Paul's stood higher than Blackfriars Bridge. The junction of the traffic in the new street with that of Ludgate Hill in St. Paul's Churchyard, and with the traffic of Holborn in Cheapside, would be very obstructive. St. Paul's Churchyard would require to be widened at a very large cost. He was therefore reluctantly obliged to come to the conclusion that a street direct to St. Paul's Cathedral was not advisable. The street proposed in the Bill which he asked leave to introduce would go in a very straight direction from Chatham Place to Charlotte Row, near the Mansion House. It would not be an expensive route to take, because, crossing diagonally, it did not interfere with any streets where large retail trades were carried on. It would pass from Chatham Place across Earl Street, proceeding with a slightly northern inclination to Bennet's Hill, between Thames Street and Little Knight-rider Street, enter Cannon Street West, cross Queen Street at the junction with Watling Street and Bucklersbury, and proceed straight to the north angle of Charlotte Row by the Mansion House. Here the outlet was narrow for both the traffic of the new street and that of the Poultry; but power was given in the Bill to widen the east end of the Poultry, and the removal of a few houses would give ample space for traffic. The rapidity of locomotion which prevailed over the rest of England ceased in the heart of its commercial activity, and the quickest way of reaching the Bank was on foot; the traffic through the City had been paralysed, but this line of thoroughfare would at once restore circulation. The funds for forming the new street were to be drawn from the Thames Embankment Fund, created by the Act of 1861. The total ultimate cost of the street was estimated at about £600,000, and the first outlay at a million. In order to supply the deficiency which might thus be occasioned to the fund, it was proposed to prolong the coal duties for a further period of ten years beyond the year 1871, till 1881. He did not propose to make any alteration in the mode of collection or in the amount to be paid. It was generally agreed that the coal duty was to be appropriated to metropolitan improvements; and he had to ask the House to enable the Metropolitan Board of Works to borrow money at once upon the security of the future proceeds of this coal tax. If that were done, and the tax were taken for the further period he had named, the money would be provided not only for these improvements, but for others required in the metropolis. It was greatly desired that some portion of the southern shore of the Thames should be embanked. The Royal Commission which considered the question of embanking the Surrey side of the river reported in favour of an embankment to extend from Westminster Bridge to Chelsea Bridge. He was afraid that scheme was too extensive to be carried into effect; but some portions of it were most urgently required, particularly that which lay between Lambeth Palace and the gasworks near Vauxhall Bridge. If the residue of this extended coal tax were expended in making an embankment on that spot, which might hereafter become a part of a general embankment of the Surrey shore, inundations would be prevented, and a useful thoroughfare established. A Bill was under consideration for that southern embankment, but it was thought better not to make it part of the scheme which he now proposed, and it would form the subject of a separate measure. The next improvement in point of urgency was the raising of the valley between Holborn Hill and Skinner Street. If the coal duties were extended as he proposed, that portion of them which was under the control of the City Corporation would be expended in that improvement, and in taking advantage of the present opportunity to re-arrange all those streets which would be disturbed by the various railways now proposed underground and overhead in that vicinity, and to Smithfield Market. In that way he believed the coal duties might be made most serviceable towards the objects for which they had hitherto been granted. He might add that the embankment near Lambeth of which he had spoken would become very useful as a thoroughfare to the Nine Elms and Vauxhall stations, which at present were very difficult of access. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in his Bill.

MR. LOCKE said, that the particular improvement of the new street from Blackfriars Bridge to the Mansion House was by no means a new one. Some twelve or fifteen years back the Corporation of London entered upon that very improvement, and they had in the Cannon Street improvements already commenced this new street, which was intended to run from Cannon Street down to Blackfriars Bridge. Now, on the part of his constituents, he wanted to know why the right hon. Gentleman proposed to transfer from the City of London to the Metropolitan Board of Works the advantage and the honour of making that street, and to place it on the remaining portion of the inhabitants of the metropolis? The new street was already commenced—some hundred yards of it or more had been already completed. New Cannon Street was an honour to the City. It was true, that as the old houses had been left on one side and new ones built on the other, it could not be considered as a Parisian improvement; but in this metropolis, where they did not expect things to be quite well done, it must be admitted that New Cannon Street answered very well. Why, then, stop the City of London in that which they had commenced? Why should that House, hardly cool from having appropriated the coal duty for ten years, be asked to appropriate it for ten years more? The right hon. Gentleman talked about bridging over the Holborn valley. Why, that had been talked about for the last hundred years, and no attempt had been made to carry out the work. Out of the 13*d.* coal duty paid by the whole metropolis the City of London was to have 4*d.* What had been done with that 4*d.*, and what was to be done with it? Before the House came to a decision on this matter they ought to know what the City of London had done with that 4*d.*, and whether the City was not in a position with that 4*d.* to carry out its own improvements. If the Chief Commissioner of Works was not sufficiently in the confidence of the City authorities to be able to furnish the House with the requisite information on that point, the Lord Mayor, whom he was glad to see in his place, would perhaps favour them with it. A new street from Blackfriars to the Mansion House was, no doubt, very desirable, but he warned the right hon. Gentleman that his estimate of its expense was likely to prove very incorrect. The property through which the new thoroughfare would pass was almost as valuable as that in any other part of the City, and it was a great mistake to imagine that it would not cost much to buy it up because it comprised few retail shops. But did the right hon. Gentleman think that retail trades were the chief value with regard to buildings in the City? If the right hon. Gentleman knew anything about compensations, he would know that there were such things as markets in the City of London, and that the wholesale houses had their business premises in those markets; and the argument always used in City compensation cases was that a considerable amount should be given, because, when a business house was removed from the neighbourhood of a market, there would be great difficulty in finding other eligible premises. His opinion was that the compensation required for this street would be enormous, and he believed that the cost would be at least half as much again as that estimated by the right hon. Gentleman. It was remarkable that the right hon. Gentleman should ask for leave to introduce a Bill to impose upon the Metropolitan Board of Works a task to which he believed their sanction had not been asked. The right hon. Gentleman had said that when the question last came before the Committee very little was understood about it; but sufficient was understood about the Thames Embankment to reject that part of the scheme, and to decide that the Embankment should be from Westminster Bridge down to Blackfriars, and there to stop; and their intention was, that if carried further, the City was to execute it out of the 4d. from the coal duties to which he had before referred.

MR. WALPOLE rose to a point of order. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he was going to extend the period over which the coal duties would exist and out of the monies obtained by the extended term of those duties he expected to obtain sufficient to pay for the new works now proposed. If that were so, he would ask whether it was competent to proceed with the Bill without previously going into a Committee of the whole House?

MR. COWPER said, that what he desired to convey was that this Bill would give the Metropolitan Board of Works power to appropriate money out of the Thames Embankment Fund for the purpose of those works; therefore, this Bill, not going beyond the giving of the power to the Metropolitan Board, could not be considered as raising any tax or imposing any duty. It gave no power whatever to increase the Thames Embankment Fund. But he thought it necessary to state, that in order to make sure that this Thames Embankment Fund would be able to meet all the charges which might come upon it, it was his intention at a future day to propose a Bill having for its object to replenish and increase that fund; but he had thought it right on this occasion to follow the precedent of last year. They knew what the Thames Embankment Fund was at the present moment, but he had no wish to run any risk, and therefore he intended at a future day to ask the House for the means of increasing that fund.

MR. HENLEY said, here was a Minister of the Crown bringing in a Bill to enable certain bodies to do certain things, and to pay for the work out of certain funds which he knew were insufficient. He said that these certain funds having been appropriated by the House to another object, he knew they would be insufficient to carry out the new scheme which he was now proposing; and therefore at some future time he would come and ask them to renew a certain tax for ten years. That was placing the House in this unfortunate position, that they would be assenting to a thing to be done without assenting to the mode of paying for it. It might be strictly in order, but he could not but say that it was not a convenient mode of doing business. It was only fair to the House and the parties who would have to pay this tax that the propriety of continuing the tax should be considered at the same time as the scheme was proposed, which for anything he knew might be a very good one.

MR. SPEAKER said, he thought that upon the point of order, what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) was a correct exposition of the state of the case —that it was rather a question of form and convenience of legislation than a question of order. If no charge was imposed upon the public by the Bill, the case did not arise in which it would be necessary to go into a Committee of the whole House to obtain its previous sanction. Until such a question arose, it did not appear to him that the right hon. Gentleman was wrong in point of order in the course he had pursued.

Mr. DOULTON said, he did not rise to dispute the position of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) as to the necessity of metropolitan improvements, but to ask him to postpone the consideration of this Bill for a week or two on a variety of considerations. One reason was, that the Board who by this Bill were delegated to carry out the improvement would meet on Wednesday next in order to consider the propriety of abandoning a considerable portion of the street as proposed to be laid out by the right hon. Gentleman. It did appear to him that the right hon. Gentleman would be placed in an anomalous position in asking for power to make a certain street when those who were to carry it out might not feel inclined to do so. Another reason was, that there was not in the Bill any proposal to raise the money. That, he understood, was a question that was to come on in a few weeks. Then he wanted to know why the right hon. Gentleman introduced this Bill at all? He asked him to postpone it because the City authorities were divided in opinion as to whether the lower portion of this street should be constructed. Like his hon. Friend the Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke), he was opposed to paying for the improvement out of the 9d. coal duties. Let the City carry out this improvement and pay it out of the 4d. coal duty. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to postpone it to give further time to those who were interested to discuss the question. Another reason was, that the engineers employed by the right hon. Gentleman and the engineers employed by the Metropolitan Board of Works were directly at variance as to both the cost and the gradients; and when he told the House that some hundreds of thousands of pounds were involved in this difference of opinion it would be seen at once that further discussion by the Board was necessary before they proceeded with this Bill.

THE LORD MAYOR (Mr. Alderman ROSE) said, that the hon. and learned

Mr. Speaker

Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) had correctly stated that it was part of the City scheme that New Cannon Street should be continued to Blackfriars Bridge to form an outlet for the Thames Embankment when completed. But, as hon. Gentlemen must be aware, the reason the street was not continued was because they had no funds. The 4d. coal tax was forestalled by the streets already made; and therefore the City was in this difficulty, that while they felt this outlet was required to relieve their most enormous traffic, they had no funds to make the street. Therefore it was that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) proposed to continue the coal tax for a certain longer period, in order that the funds might be raised for the construction, not only of the street which the City authorities contemplated in the first instance, but to carry it on to the Mansion House. It was absolutely necessary that something should be done to relieve the City of the enormous traffic; but he for one did most earnestly object to the introduction of the Metropolitan Board into the City proper. They had done their work well and faithfully, and he was sorry to see any Board imported for the construction of streets in the City of London—a duty which had been well done by the City itself. They were in this difficulty, that they had not got the means to carry out what they desired; and he thought that if the House thought it wise to continue the coal tax, they could not do better than give the City authorities power to carry out the scheme now proposed.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, that the right hon. Gentleman should have first brought in a Bill for the embankment of the Surrey side of the Thames. [A laugh.] Gentlemen might laugh, but he could tell them that the inhabitants of that side were great sufferers from inundations, and something was absolutely required to be done for the future protection of their property. He dared say that the scheme proposed by the right hon. Gentleman was a good one, but there was no absolute necessity for it, while there was an absolute necessity for relief to be given to the inhabitants of the Surrey side. The highest authority in that House—the noble Lord at the head of the Government—had stated that the embanking of the Surrey portion was more urgently required than the north, and he was perfectly correct. Then, again, it was most unbusiness-like that the right hon. Gentleman had not provided the means for carrying out his object. He thought that the Bill ought to be postponed.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY deprecated the attempts made to procure a postponement of the measure. At any rate, it ought to be introduced, in order that hon. Members might see what it contained. The Lord Mayor had advocated the taking of the work out of the hands of the Board of Works, and placing it in the hands of the City, and yet we were informed that it was twenty years since the City began the improvement, and only one hundred yards were now completed, they having failed for want of money. Was that really any encouragement to them to postpone a measure of which there was a reasonable expectation that it would be practical and useful? He hoped that this Bill would be at once introduced. Of course, there need be no hurry about the second reading.

MR. ALDERMAN CUBITT trusted there would be no postponement of the measure, for every day was of the greatest importance to the traffic of the metropolis. The Committee of last year considered it necessary that a new street should be made from Blackfriars Bridge. The embankment had been intrusted to the Board of Works; and it was most desirable that the new street should be proceeded with simultaneously with the embankment; but he must say that he participated with the Lord Mayor in his regret that the City had not the carrying out of the works. It was a question, as most questions were, of pounds, shillings, and pence. Such a street as the right hon. Gentleman had proposed, so suited to the purpose, so absolutely necessary, ought to be constructed, and that quickly; and he hoped that no delay would be interposed on the part of the House, but that the House would allow the right hon. Gentleman to bring in the Bill.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he did not wish to throw any obstacle in the way of the introduction of the Bill, which contained some good points, but at the same time it would require a critical examination in Committee. One among its good points was that it did not interfere with the large commercial interests below Blackfriars Bridge. On the other hand, he did not view with favour the introduction into the City of London of diagonal streets, as they led to great and practical inconvenience, and embarrassed the traffic. If the formation of the new street was not carefully carried out, there would be great obstruction at Blackfriars Bridge. Unfortunately the Corporation had not the means of conducting this work at the cost and charges of the City; and as the work could only be done by monies raised from the metropolis generally, he thought that the inhabitants of the metropolis at large were justly entitled, through their representatives at the Board of Works, to the conduct of the work. The success with which the City had carried out the Cannon Street improvement would justify their being intrusted with this work if they had been able to provide the funds. The reason why the Committee of last Session struck out the clauses regarding this new street was because they found that the estimates of the engineers of the Board of Works were based on insufficient data, and differed so much from the information obtained by the City in the construction of Cannon Street as in the judgment of the Committee rendered them not reliable, and it was thought better to bring in a Bill this year. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) had alluded to the probable necessity for pulling down houses on the south side of the Poultry and at the end opposite the Mansion House, with a view of providing increased space for the traffic there. He did not know how funds were to be provided for this scheme, as he did not think it would be possible to find any part of London where the claims for compensation would be larger than at that particular spot. On this subject he might state that the Charing Cross Railway Company intended to construct a station where the Unity Buildings now stood in Cannon Street. This station would probably be a great place for the continental traffic, and it would be necessary to widen all the streets connected with it.

LORD FERMOY said, that nobody denied that the new street would be very useful—the question was, who was to pay for it? His right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor said that the City was too poor to do it at its own expense. Why, the City was the richest community in the world, and yet it was said to be too poor to pay for its own improvements. It was desirable that the House should have a few particulars laid before them in reference to what had been done with the 4d. coal tax. They had heard that it had been spent or hypothecated; but they had never had a clear and business-like account in reference to the matter. Until that was done, on the part of his constituents he protested against the City putting their hands into other people's pockets to pay for City improvements. They had heard that differences had arisen between the engineers of different schemes, amounting to hundreds of thousands of pounds. If that were true, what was the grand total of the enormous sums of which this was only the difference? Considering the enormous sum which would be required to pay for this new street, he could not help coming to the conclusion that the Chief Commissioner had done wrong in introducing a measure which, like this one, prejudged the question how the work was to be paid for. Last year he assented to the Thames Embankment being paid for by the coal tax, because that was a work of great necessity to the whole metropolis, and his constituents contributed very largely to the coal duties. But at the same time, he gave notice that the improvement was of no more advantage to his constituents than it was to any of the inhabitants of places within twenty miles round London; and that he would not consent to the whole of the City improvements being dealt with in that way. The proposed street would cost about £1,000,000; and if that large sum was to come out of the coal duty, he should like to know when any other part of the metropolis would have a chance of putting their hands upon any part of the produce of the tax. He hoped that they might not be put into the painful position of having to oppose a Bill introduced by the Government. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would get up and say he would, on a future day, bring in this Bill and also a Bill to provide the funds at the same time.

Mr. NORRIS said, the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone had complained that no account had been exhibited of the expenditure of the 4d. coal duty, and the complaint appeared to indicate the erroneous theory that the City authorities were responsible to the metropolitan Members. The 4d. was an immemorial right appertaining to the City of London—[No, no!]—and did not come within the category of taxes which were properly subject to regulation by that House. Whether it were an immemorial right or not, the Corporation had received it through many centuries, and had performed the obligation of spending it with great purity and usefulness, and had obtained great credit for the public works which they had carried out by means of that fund. He would, however, give the House an epitome of the accounts, showing what had been done with the produce of the 4d. coal duty. The fund had been anticipated in one way and another for the making of Moorgate Street, Gresham Street, New Cannon Street, and for other public improvements, and it was somewhat more than exhausted at the present time. The present Bill was only one of several which proposed to take away forty acres of house and street property in the City, for the purpose of effecting great public improvements. This was a great sacrifice on the part of the inhabitants; and the extent and number of the alterations were such as to render it incumbent on the House to see that those improvements were carried out in an harmonious and well-devised scheme. The Chamberlain of London, a most competent authority, had calculated that the income of the Corporation from the 4d. tax for the period for which it had been extended would amount to £330,000; and the proposal of the Corporation to raise Holborn valley would require from £380,000, to £400,000 to carry it out. It would be for the House to consider whether the coal tax should be appropriated to the purpose of this great improvement in connection with the railway works which were about to be carried out in that neighbourhood, or for making the street to the Mansion House; but in either case the duration of the duty must be continued beyond the period for which it was already imposed. He hoped the House would permit this Bill to be laid upon the table, and that it, with other Bills proposing to take land and make improvements in the City, would be referred to a Committee or to the right hon. Gentleman's Department, or would be dealt with by the House altogether. There was another circumstance which he would mention. The Great Eastern Railway proposed to extend their line into Finsbury Circus at a level of 18 or 20 feet above the streets, whilst the Metropolitan Line proposed to go to the same place, but in a cutting about 18 or 20 feet below the surface; so that any person wishing to pass from one line to another would have to ascend or descend about 40 feet. This was one of the matters which would require consideration. Another was that the Corporation were coming to Parliament with a Bill to rebuild Blackfriars Bridge, and the works should be constructed so that the new street and the Embankment should be in harmony with the new bridge and with the railway station in Cannon Street.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, that all the speeches he had heard had shown the necessity of postponing the Bill, and therefore he would suggest that it should be withdrawn for a fortnight, and that the two Bills for executing the work and providing the money should be brought in at the same time. He thought the feeling of the House was in favour of a postponement of the Bill. There was no wish to throw any undue obstacles in the way of those great works; but, representing as he did a district of the metropolis, he had every objection that for a purely City improvement the metropolis should be called upon to pay the whole expense.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: If my right hon. Friend was asking the House to decide upon the third reading of this Bill, the appeals which have been made would have some foundation, because it might fairly be said, "Don't let us pass a Bill affirming that a certain work is to be done until we see how the means are to be provided from which the expense is to be defrayed." But that which my right hon. Friend is asking the House is simply to allow him to bring in a Bill that it may see what the measure is, and may in course of time determine whether this work is one which it is expedient to execute. If my right hon. Friend had followed the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), he would have been open to the charge of putting the cart before the horse, to which he is now not liable, because to have brought in a Bill providing a sum of money without previously determining to what object it is to be applied, would have been a solecism in legislation, and my right hon. Friend would have been told, "Don't ask us to continue a tax unless you tell us to what object it is to be applied. First let us approve of the work, and then determine how the money is to be raised." I therefore think that the course of proceeding adopted by my right hon. Friend is perfectly logical and perfectly Parliamentary. If the House gives him leave to bring in this Bill, he will, in the shortest possible time, introduce the other, and before the week is over the House will have both Bills before it, and will be able to form a judgment upon the subject. We can, however, do only one thing at a time, and it is impossible to move for leave to bring in two Bills at once, and thus, as it were, take a double-barreled shot at the House. My right hon. Friend has, I think, judged rightly that the first thing to be done was to bring in the Bill proposing the work, and then, before that Bill is read a second time, to introduce the other, showing in what way the necessary funds are to be raised. Great objection has been made to the proposal that the expense of making an improvement within the City should be defrayed out of funds raised from the whole of the metropolis. That argument would be well founded upon the assumption that the improvement to be made will be solely and entirely for the benefit of the City of London; but surely no man who has of late years gone from one end of the town to the other can be under the impression that increasing the approaches from the West End to the City is a matter which purely and solely concerns the inhabitants of the City. Why, it concerns all that immense number of persons in the metropolis who from day to day have business in the City; and of its necessity no one can require proof, because you have only some fine morning to take a cab at Charing Cross, and order the cabman to drive into the City, and by the time that you have spent two or three hours in getting there, and two or three hours in getting back, you will be amply convinced that some additional line of communication is required for the convenience, not only of the people of the City, but of the people of the metropolis in general. Therefore, it seems to me to be perfectly just and right that the cost of this improvement, which we all admit to be absolutely necessary, should be defrayed out of the produce of a tax which is applicable to the whole of the metropolis. Of course, every man has his own peculiar scheme. The hon. and learned Member for Lambeth (Mr. Locke) says that you ought to begin by embanking the southern side of the river. I quite admit that that work is urgently required; but we have embarked on another scheme. We have begun the embankment of the northern side, and that embankment will not be productive of all the advantages derivable from it unless we provide this further development for the accommodation of traffic. Therefore, I say, let us finish one thing before we begin another, and I shall be ready to concur with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Lambeth as to the necessity, as soon as we can do it, of embanking the southern shore of the river, for the purpose of rescuing the people of Lambeth from what we all know to be an intolerable nuisance arising from the floods which fill up their cellars and their streets with the most odious refuse. I hope that the House will not refuse my right hon. Friend leave to bring in this Bill, and they may be well assured that in the course of a few days he will bring in the other which he has mentioned. A good deal has been said about a great difference between the calculations of the engineers who have calculated the expense of this street. It is said that that difference amounts to several hundreds of thousands of pounds. I believe that those who have made that statement are entirely misinformed. As far as I am informed, it is quite a mistake. There have been differences of opinion as to the gradients which it may be desirable to adopt, but there has been no difference whatever as to the expense.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for making a new Street from Blackfriars to the Mansion House, in the City of London, in connection with the Embankment of the River Thames on the northern side of that river; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. COWPER and Mr. PEELE.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 23.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to give a certain extension of credit to those maltsters who might desire to avail themselves of it, in respect of a portion of the duty which they were called upon to pay. The Bill did not relate to the general arrangement of the malt duty and malt credits, which had been placed upon a footing that, he believed, was liable to no impeachment in point of equity. Upon the average at least nine weeks were given to the maltster between the time of charge and the time of payment of duty; and that would pretty fairly represent the period in which he would generally sell his malt and receive the money for it before he was called upon to pay the tax. There was, however, a certain period—the first half of the financial year—in which brewing was almost entirely suspended, and during which the maltster had to pay duty upon his malt before he could sell it. The Bill which he asked leave to introduce was intended to meet that hardship and establish a fair equilibrium between the charge of the duty upon the maltster and his power of getting it back from his customers. For the collection of the malt tax the financial year was divided into eight periods called "rounds" of an average length of six weeks and a half each. Under the present system the duty was levied in the round next but one after that in which it had been charged. The duty charged in the first round—that was, between the 1st of April and the middle of May was levied in the third round—that was, between the 1st of July and the middle of August. A very considerable sum (about £800,000) was annually charged in the first round of the financial year. What he proposed was to authorize the Government to grant the maltsters, if they thought fit to avail themselves of it, upon the usual terms, bonds being taken and they paying 4 per cent interest, an additional credit of three months. That would enable them to postpone the payment of the duty upon the malt which they made during these six weeks until the fifth round—that was, until October; thus paying it in the third quarter of the year, instead of having to pay it, as heretofore, in the third round. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MR. PULLER said, he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman was not prepared to extend to the maltsters a more substantial measure of relief. The second contraction of the malt credit which took place three years ago had, as he then predicted, ruined many of the small maltsters, the number of licensed maltsters having in that time diminished by 400. It was true that there was a period of the year extending from the middle of May to the beginning of October during which malt could not be made, and during which, therefore, the maltster was obliged to have a stock of malt in hand, for which he had no immediate market; and to that period the relief now offered was confined; but by the contraction to which he referred, the maltsters were placed at a great disadvantage during the whole year, because the revenue officers, when charging them with duty, included in the amount malt in its early stage of manufacture, and which would not be ready for sale for several weeks; and, moreover, it required several maltings to produce a sufficient quantity of malt to effect a sale. Although this was called a duty upon malt, it was really a tax upon beer, and was paid by the consumers of that article; but, in point of fact, the duty was now got into the Exchequer long before it was paid by those on whom it ought really to fall. The burden of thus advancing the duties, requiring, of course, the employment of additional capital, must fall either on the maltsters or on the brewers. Under the old system, of giving eighteen weeks' credit in the collection of the duties, the Chancellors of the Exchequer obtained their money with much less loss than upon any other part of the financial system. The Exchequer gave eighteen weeks' credit to the maltsters, and the maltsters gave from three to four months' credit to the brewers. His right hon. Friend had contracted the maltster's credits; had he also contracted the brewer's? Quite the contrary. The maltster was placed far more at the mercy of the brewer than ever he had been before, because the brewer, a man of large capital, knew that the maltster must sell by a certain day, and by holding off was therefore enabled to cheapen the commodity. These disadvantages were aggravated by being compelled to manufacture within seven months the quantity required for a whole year's consumption. He believed that the old amount of credit was by no means an unreasonable one, but the trade would agree to meet the Chancellor of the Exchequer half-way if he would consent to allow a period of twelve weeks credit instead of six.

MR. DODSON said, that the hon. Gentleman was mistaken as to the number of maltsters. There were, in fact, rather more of them in 1862 than there had been in 1860. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be induced to reconsider his measure, and grant the agricultural interest two boons—first, to reduce the amount of the impost; and, secondly, to levy it on the manufactured article. The former of these propositions would stimulate consumption, and would thus avoid entailing any considerable loss upon the Treasury; and the second, while it might likewise be granted without any sacrifice of revenue would enable the farmer to malt his corn for the purpose of feeding his cattle.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down invited his attention to matters of a far wider scope than those contemplated by the present Bill. As to the reduction of the malt duty he could say nothing—it was a question of great financial extent and importance, and could only be considered in connection with the financial arrangements necessary for meeting the current expenditure of the year. The commutation of the malt into a beer duty was in many points of view desirable, but he was afraid there were insuperable difficulties in the way of such a change. It had been established by a Committee of that House, consisting of its ablest men, and especially of its most intelligent agriculturists, that there was no reason to expect any general benefit to the agricultural interest from the use of malt in feeding cattle in preference to grain. It would, likewise, be a most formidable change to release some 7,000 or 8,000 men who, under the present system, were subject to excise supervision, in order to establish restrictions similar and quite as stringent over the class of brewers, numbering 40,000. The difficulty would also arise of dealing with private brewing. It would be necessary either to exempt private brewing from the duty which every trader was compelled to pay, or else the exciseman must enter into every private house. In whatever year the House thought fit to commute the malt duty into a beer duty it must be further prepared to surrender a very large sum—perhaps a couple of millions—because the duty would not be leviable until the article reached a point considerably more advanced than that at which payment was now called for.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to extend the credit for payment of a portion of the Excise Duty on Malt, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Mr. PERK.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 20.]

EXPLANATION.

EARL RUSSELL : My Lords, when I was absent from the House last evening, having been detained by public business elsewhere, some remarks were made by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) with regard to some events that have recently occurred in Brazil. The papers relating to that subject will shortly be laid on the table, and I do not think it of any use calling attention to the matter without going into the details of it. At the same time, as so much has been said founded upon an ex parte statement which has come from Brazil, I will take the liberty of informing your Lordships what is the general outline of the case. In the beginning of the year 1861 there was a rumour that some sailors had been washed ashore near the Rio Grande do Sul. Our Consul made inquiries, and found not only that bodies had been washed ashore, but also that there had been a wreck; and on further inquiries he found that many articles, apparently taken from a wreck, being entirely dry, and not having been exposed to the action of sea-water, were in the possession of persons residing along the coast. Upon further inquiry the Consul heard that ten bodies had been washed ashore; but he was induced rather to doubt the truth of that statement. When he asked to have the bodies produced, only four out of the ten were forthcoming, and with regard to the six, it was declared that they could not be found; but as it was said that all the bodies which came on shore had been buried in the sand of the sea-shore, the Consul thought that the excuses made to him were rather improbable. It was strange, that if all the bodies had been buried as described, six of them could not be found. Rumours were circulated, too, that persons who had landed from the Prince of Wales, which was the name of the vessel, had been strangled or otherwise murdered. These rumours excited a considerable degree of attention. The Consul asked that an inquest might be held on the bodies; but an inquest was prevented by persons apparently possessed of official authority, who were present with a strong armed escort. The six bodies were not produced until many months after, when they were entirely decomposed, and of course it was impossible to trace any marks upon them. It was a mere matter of probability only that these persons had been murdered, but it was at the same time a matter of certainty that the local authorities had prevented an inquiry being made into the facts and had not produced the six bodies. Upon this a demand was made on the Brazilian Government for reparation; and in the January following I wrote to our Minister desiring that a full inquiry should be made into the facts of the case. We got nothing but answers of the most evasive kind from the Brazilian Government. The Consul thought it was not fit—our Minister and Her Majesty's Government also thought that it was not fit—that such an occurrence should pass by unnoticed and without something being done to prevent a repetition of it at a future time. Another difficulty shortly after arose. Two officers and a chaplain belonging to Her Majesty's ship Forte were returning from a walk in the country, and on one of them approaching a Brazilian sentinel and asking him in Spanish what road they should take, he immediately struck him with the butt end of his musket. His two companions then came up; the sentinel called the guard, and the three Englishmen were taken off to the guard-house. They immediately wrote down their names as officers of one of Her Majesty's ships, and also wrote a letter to the commander of their ship. That letter never was delivered; and next morning they were marched to Rio and placed in a very filthy gaol. At eleven o'clock next day they were liberated. This appeared to be a deliberate insult to officers of Her Majesty's service, and the case was one which it was thought required some reparation. Every device was resorted to by the Brazilian authorities to avoid this. It was first said that the officers had attacked the sentinel, then that they were drunk, and that they had not given their names; all of which statements were contrary to the facts. The correspondence began in June 1861, and it was not until October, 1862, that Her Majesty's Government felt called on to take some course to obtain reparation. There were only two courses which it appeared to me could be taken. One was to demand ample reparation from the Brazilian Government and to enforce that reparation; the other was to withdraw our ships from the Brazilian waters, and to declare to our merchantmen that they could expect no protection against similar treatment; and that if any of the crews of our merchant ships were murdered, we did not intend to resent it. That course it was impossible for Her Majesty's Government to pursue. Our Minister, therefore, did demand a moderate reparation from the Brazilian Government. He was instructed, that if instead of making immediate reparation, the Brazilian Government proposed arbitration, he should refer it home for decision before accepting it. But he found that nothing could be done. No proposal for arbitration was made, and then he had recourse to those measures of reprisals which have been complained of. I certainly cannot see anything to be objected to in this course, for it cannot be contended that when British ships are plundered and British officers insulted that we are not to make demands for reparation.

THE EARL OF DERBY:—My Lords, it is quite true that yesterday in the absence of the noble Earl I did ask when these papers would be produced, and I certainly did express a hope that they would dissipate an impression likely to be caused by the perusal of the papers published by the Brazilian Government, that our representative at Rio had acted in a manner which could not meet with the approval of Her Majesty's Government. I must say that the noble Earl has this evening taken a very inconvenient and unusual course, in taking, while merely promising that the papers shall be forthcoming, the opportunity of making an ex parte statement with regard to a certain portion of these transactions. This certainly is a course I never knew taken by any Minister of the Crown before. If the noble Earl had contented himself with saying that the Brazilian papers did not give the whole correspondence, and that when the papers he intended to lay on the table were pe-rused we should be in a better position to form a just judgment on the transaction, it would have been quite sufficient in this stage of the business; but he has not only made a partial statement, but he has, I think, omitted from it altogether certain circumstances that appear to me to be material. I will not enter into a discussion of the merits of the case, for I have only seen the correspondence published by the Brazilian Government. There are many difficulties in the matter, and many conflicting statements, which probably will be cleared up. I will only say, that in reference to the case of the officers there is a considerable conflict of evidence. It may be that these officers have been grievously insulted, or that they were in plain clothes and were treated with a want of consideration which would not have been shown to them had they been in uniform or if their rank had been known. In the other case, however, the noble Earl really lays down doctrines which he will find it difficult to maintain. Here is the case of a ship wrecked upon a part of the coast which is nearly uninhabited—certain bodies are found of persons who had been washed on shore from shipwreck, or who, having reached the shore alive, were subsequently murdered. It is a suspicion—nothing more—we have nothing before us to show us how far it is supported, and on those facts a demand is made on the Brazilian Government, by which they are made pecuniarily responsible for the wreck, and are required to pay the whole value of the ship and cargo. If such a circumstance had occurred in England, the only claim which could have been made against our Government would have been for neglecting to put the law effectually into operation for the discovery of the offenders. We have no other claim of reparation against the Brazilian Government. But even if the claim were well founded, he did not see how they could be made answerable for the value of a ship and cargo which was clearly lost by stress of weather, and not by any act of the Brazilian Government. I am afraid that even in this highly civilized country there may be some remote parts in which the practice of wrecking still prevails, and Her Majesty's Government would certainly be very much astonished if they were suddenly called upon to pay the value of any ship which might be wrecked on those parts of the coast, and might fall into the hands of such persons; and if in support of a demand of this sort a certain number of British ships had been seized, matters would have been brought to such a point, that if the question had been between two powerful Governments, it would have been difficult to avoid hostilities. That is a part of the case with which the noble Earl has not dealt. It requires consideration, and I hope the papers to be laid before us by Her Majesty's Government will put a more satisfactory complexion on it than it assumes in the papers already published.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, if the noble Earl had contented himself with asking when these papers would be ready, I should not have said a word on the subject. My intention was to place the papers on the table without saying a word. But when the noble Earl came down to this House—I happening to be absent—and on imperfect information expresses a strong opinion that Her Majesty's representative at Rio had committed an act of injustice, it was time for me to take some notice of it. It little adds to the noble Earl's authority that he has not gone into the particulars of the cases he spoke of. With respect to the noble Earl's view of the law of nations, I doubt whether he will find any authorities to support him. It was the opinion of the Queen's Advocate, to whom I referred the matter, that if a wreck is plundered, and if the Government does not take sufficient and proper means to bring the offenders to justice, the Government that has been guilty of that neglect are liable to the demand to make good the loss that has been incurred by that neglect. We did not claim the full value of the cargo from the Brazilian Government, but we stated what the owners had demanded. We asked that it should be fairly and fully inquired into by a commission appointed by both sides, and that any items might be struck out which appeared excessive. On an occasion when an Austrian ship was wrecked on the coast of Ireland, and afterwards plundered, every means was taken to bring the offenders to justice; and, though Lord Palmerston, who was Secretary for Foreign Affairs at the time, said that the Government were not strictly liable for the damage done, still his sense of justice induced him to recommend the payment of a sum of money as compensation for the injury. And that I think is a course which any civilized country should adopt.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I can quite understand that the noble Viscount's sense of justice and good feeling might induce him to adopt the course stated by the noble Earl; but if a demand had been made by the Austrian Minister, supported by an armed force, I venture to think the noble Viscount would not have been disposed to comply with it.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES—MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN.

ESTABLISHMENT FOR THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

“VICTORIA R.

“Her Majesty relies on the Loyalty and Affection of the House of Lords, and on the cordial Interest which they have manifested in the happy Event of the approaching Marriage of The Prince of Wales to The Princess Alexandra of Denmark, that they will be ready to concur in such Provision as may be judged necessary to enable Her Majesty to settle an Establishment for the Prince and Princess suited to their Rank and Dignity.”

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in accordance with the precedents on such occasions, I rise to move an Address to the Queen in answer to the Message which Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to communicate to your Lordships respecting the intended marriage of the Prince of Wales with the Princess Alexandra of Denmark. Her Majesty was graciously pleased in the Speech from the Throne to intimate that intended alliance. The reception which that passage in the Speech met with from your Lordships and the cheers with which the observations of the Mover and Seconder, and those of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) and other Peers, referring to that passage, were received, manifested how heartily your Lordships joined with Her Majesty in the satisfaction that She must derive from an event which in Her judgment and that of Her lamented Consort will be calculated to promote the happiness of the Prince of Wales. No doubt your Lordships were anxious on that occasion to pay a just tribute to the personal character of His Royal Highness and that of the illustrious Princess to whom he is about to ally himself in marriage; but you also felt that this is an event not only interesting to the Royal Family, but likely to contribute much to the welfare of the people at large. Your Lordships embodied that sentiment in an Address unanimously adopted. I have, therefore, no difficulty whatever in asking you to agree to a Resolution which, even in the absence of those feelings to which I have just alluded, would, on constitutional grounds, commend itself to the Legislature of a country with monarchical institutions such as exist among us. My Lords, I beg to move—

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to return to Her Majesty the Thanks of this House for Her most gracious Message, and to assure Her Majesty that this House will immediately proceed to the Consideration thereof, in such a Manner as shall demonstrate their Zeal, Duty, and affectionate Attachment to Her Majesty and a due Regard to the Rank and Dignity of the Royal Family.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, if this was a question on which there could possibly have arisen a difference of opinion, I should have thought, whatever may have been the precedents, it would have been more convenient for the noble Earl to have given notice that he would move that the House should take Her Majesty's Gracious Message into consideration on some future day—which is the course, I understand, that has been taken by the other House of Parliament; but this question is one on which, whether the attendance of Peers was large or small, no difference of opinion could arise; and therefore I cheerfully concur in the Motion, and second it, if the noble Earl thinks it will be more complimentary to Her Majesty, that it should be adopted without further delay. As the noble Earl has truly stated, we have already offered our congratulations to Her Majesty on this auspicious event; for, in answer to Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne, we have taken occasion to express, both on public grounds and private, our loyal satisfaction at the approaching marriage of the Prince of Wales. The present Address is in pursuance—a fulfilment, in point of fact—of expectations which Parliament held out that we were willing to take every step in our power to give effect to the desire expressed by Her Majesty. The question, as far as it is one of Supply, more properly belongs to the other House of Parliament in the first instance; and if I am rightly informed of the proposition which is to be made to that House, I quite concur with the Government in thinking that the reasonableness and moderation of the proposition is such as that neither in that House nor in this can any exception be taken to it on financial or other grounds. It is of the utmost importance to this country that a person in the position of the Prince of Wales should be supplied with an income sufficient to keep up a becoming dignity without involving him in the danger or necessity of incurring debts. We know that the incurring of debts by former heirs to the Throne led to very unpleasant feelings between the Crown and the people. If I am rightly informed, the provision about to be proposed for the Prince of Wales will enable him to accomplish the former object without involving him in the danger to which I have just referred. I am sure that His Royal Highness, having before him the example of careful, prudent, and economical management set by his illustrious parents, will carefully avoid in the management of his Household both extremes—either a parsimony unworthy his station, or, on the other hand, an extravagance which could only lead to embarrassment. My Lords, I feel much pleasure in seconding the Motion, and am confident you will unanimously concur in the Address proposed by the noble Earl.

EARL GRANVILLE explained that the course which he asked their Lordships to follow on the occasion and that taken by the House of Commons were both in accordance with precedent.

Motion agreed to, Nemine Dissentiente; The said Address to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY then rose to call the attention of this House to the Correspondence recently presented on the Affairs of Rome; and to ask Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for some Explanation of certain Passages contained therein, referring to the Policy of Her Majesty's Government on this Subject in the year 1849? The noble Marquess said, that the words in the recently presented papers to which he intended to direct their Lordships' attention were not many. In one of the despatches contained in the Correspondence, dated the 15th of November last, it was stated that the acquiescence expressed by our Government in 1849 in respect of the occupation of Rome by the French did not imply approbation. Now, that assertion was in direct contradiction of a statement of M. Drouyn de Lhuys, who, as would be admitted by every one who had ever had any dealings with him, possessed qualifications in respect of memory which made him a most accurate chronicler of events. During the last recess his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary had thought it right to enter into communication with two Foreign Governments on two most important points, and he did so in a manner to render difficult questions still more difficult. He (the Marquess of Normanby) would first of all refer to a despatch of the noble Earl, dated the 25th of October, to the attaché from Turin, to be read by him to the Cardinal Secretary of State at Rome. The proposal in that despatch was neither more nor less than that it was his (Earl Russell's) good will and pleasure that the Pope should abandon his territory, give up his friends, and seek safety in flight. That was a most extraordinary course for any Minister to propose or even to think of. But that was not all, for within a week after the French Government had declared that the national honour was involved in this question, the noble Earl addressed himself to the French Government, telling them Her Majesty's Government were of opinion the time had come when the French occupation of Rome should cease. When making a communication to an attaché to be communicated to the Pope, certainly his noble Friend was of course perfectly at liberty to adopt with safety any tone which he thought consistent with propriety and with the dignity of the country; but the moment chosen by the noble Earl was a most inopportune one to aggravate a Government like that of France, our nearest neighbour; and if such a course of proceeding were persevered in, such a state of feeling would be produced that we might find ourselves—to use a phrase adopted on a previous occasion—"drifting into a war" before we were aware of it. He would now briefly refer to the circumstances under which the French occupation of Rome took place. These circumstances did not arise under the Government of the President, but some weeks previous to the election of December 1848. When the news reached France that the first constitutional Minister of the Pope had been assassinated on the steps of the National Assembly, and that the Assembly had continued its order of the day without taking any notice of the event, so strong was the feeling of the French people that General Cavaignac, a sincere Republican, who was then at the head of affairs, thought it was necessary to send a brigade of 3,000 men to Rome. He (Lord Normanby) had thought it his duty to dissuade the Government of the General from carrying into effect that intention at that moment; but so strong was the feeling in France, even then, to support the Pope, that the Foreign Minister, Mr. Bastieles, also a sincere Republican, had told him that the decision had cost the General a million of votes. A very few days after this the President was elected and the Republic proclaimed. On the 5th of January, 1849, he (the Marquess of Normanby) received a despatch from Lord Palmerston, from which this was an extract—

"In regard to the present position of the Pope I have to observe that no doubt it is obviously desirable that a person, who in his spiritual capacity has great and extensive influence over the internal affairs of most countries in Europe, should be in such a position of independence as not to be liable to be used by any one European Power as a political instrument for the annoyance of any other Power; and in this view it is much to be wished that the Pope should be Sovereign of a territory of his own."

Now, there was nothing in this despatch to confirm his noble Friend's statement, that acquiescence did not then imply approbation. Lord Palmerston, it was true, always explained that he thought the restoration of the Pope would be followed by the restoration of constitutional Government; but in the state of things which then existed that was utterly impossible. Lord Palmerston was told by him over and over again that after the dreadful failure of constitutional Government three or four months before no Minister in France could venture to make such a proposal. Afterwards, when a request was made to the French Government, on the part of the Pope, that they would attend a conference at Gaeta of the other Catholic Powers for the purpose of arranging for the Pope's restoration, Lord Palmerston wrote—

"Although Great Britain has not so direct an interest as France has in the ecclesiastical and political questions which arise out of the present relations between the Pope and the people of the Roman States, the British Government nevertheless cannot view these matters with indifference. Great Britain is indeed a Protestant State, but Her Majesty has many millions of Catholic subjects ; and the British Government must therefore be desirous, with a view to British interests, that the Pope should be placed in such a temporal position as to be able to act with entire independence in the exercise of his spiritual functions. . . . Her Majesty's Government have learnt with much pleasure that France has been included in the invitation addressed by the Pope to some of the Catholic Powers, and Her Majesty's Government hope, that if there is to be a concert among any of the Powers of Europe in regard to these affairs, the French Government will not decline the invitation to be a party thereto."

This despatch was dated March 9, 1849 ; and how his noble Friend could reconcile such a declaration as it contained with the statement that acquiescence did not mean approbation he could not understand. In his communications with Lord Palmerston he had always expressed a wish that there should be no direct interference by the French Government. The next occasion on which it became his duty to inquire whether Her Majesty's Government wished that this interference should go on was just after April 17, when the French Assembly had voted for the departure of the expedition. On that occasion he wrote to Lord Palmerston suggesting that then was the time to decide upon this point ; that he did not venture to express dissent from French interference, because Lord Palmerston in no one of his despatches implied that he objected to it ; that he did not well see how the French could have avoided it ; but, that after having for several years endeavoured to prevent the passage of a French soldier across the frontier, he regretted that France should now be about to break the spell. The answer of Lord Palmerston was that there was a good deal of truth in all this ; that if the French troops crossed the frontier, we did not know when they would return ; but, at the same time, we could not object to this interference ; and that if the Pope was not restored by the French, he would be restored by the Austrians. On no one of these occasions was there anything to show that the acquiescences of Her Majesty's Government was not approbation. Again, when a Mr. Macarthy came to England upon a secret mission from the Triumvirs of Rome, he was instructed to say—

EARL GREY : I rise to order. Is the noble Marquess quoting from papers which have been preselected to Parliament ?

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY : No.

EARL GREY : Is the noble Marquess reading from despatches which he had received in his official position as Ambassador ?

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he would explain.

EARL GREY : Then I think that your Lordships ought not to listen to quotations from despatches which have not been laid before Parliament, these quotations being made by a noble Lord formerly a servant of the Crown, and being made without the authority of the Crown.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, his noble Friend had misunderstood him ; he was not about to read anything, but merely to repeat what he had heard from that gentleman at the time, but he did not desire to do or to say anything that was irregular ; and if there was any objection in point of form to these references, he could bring in aid plenty of other authorities. Thus, on the 20th of July, Lord Lansdowne, then the leader of this House, made in this House a speech which entirely confirmed the accuracy of the account which he had given of the matter. Lord Lansdowne said—

"I quite agree with my noble Friend Lord Brougham in the distinction drawn by him as to the peculiar character of the Papal Sovereignty, which made the Pope's authority the object of special consideration ; but this is no new idea : the same opinion is expressed in Lord Palmerston's despatch to Lord Normanby. The sovereignty of the Pope has a peculiar character. As temporal Sovereign he is only a Sovereign of the fourth or fifth order, but as spiritual Sovereign he occupies the very first rank. The authority which he possesses, the influence which he exercises over every country in Europe, indeed over the whole world, has nowhere any equal. There are, therefore, on this account special reasons for the interference of other States. The Catholic nations are therefore peculiarly called upon to take care that the head of their religion shall not be perverted into the instrument of the temporal ambition of any one. There is no country where there are Catholic subjects which is not profoundly interested that the Pope should be able to exercise his spiritual authority without having to encounter any obstacle attacking that spiritual authority." [3 Hansard, cvii. 707.]

This was the opinion of Lord Lansdowne, expressed by him in 1849 as leader of this House, with respect to the French occupation. He never expected at this interval to hear, after all the proofs he had read to their Lordships, that the Government of that day in their acquiescence did not imply approbation. But as to the question itself, he would call the attention of his noble Friend to another subject which was raised not by one connected with the country, but one who had great authority on Roman questions—he meant M. Farini, present Prime Minister of Italy. He had on former occasions referred to the personal character of M. Farini freely in reference to his conduct as Piedmontese Commissioner in Modena; but as an historian he believed he stood very much above all the revolutionary scribblers of the day. M. Farini published a book in 1852 which was translated by Mr. Gladstone. He knew his noble Friend was not very ready to acquire any information from hostile sources, but he could not object to the authority he now adduced. He had tried to get hold of Mr. Gladstone's book, but he had not been able to do so; he could not therefore give M. Farini the benefit of Mr. Gladstone's English, but the following was a faithful translation of the original:—

"A distinguished Italian writer not long ago advised the Pope to throw off the weight of the temporal power, but he did not at the same time tell him that so long as the existing constitution of the Papacy is in being it is out of his power to do so. There was the non possumus of the Pope; for himself the Pope can make a sacrifice, not for his successors."

Again—

"It is said that the temporal power is in its last agony, and that opinion condemns it; but in my opinion many successive generations will descend to their tombs before the Papal sovereignty perishes."

Again—

"I hold it is difficult that Italy, at her good pleasure, with everything in her favour, should become an entirely independent nation, but that it is almost impossible that at her good pleasure she should, I will not say destroy, but even forcibly diminish the power of the Pope."

These were the opinions of a person who had been two or three times Minister of Victor Emmanuel, and who was at this moment Minister of Turin.

He was very much struck, as every one must be who read them, with the inaccuracy as to fact of his noble Friend's despatches. In the despatches addressed to Mr. Odo Russell there was a constant allegation of successive facts, all bearing on the state of things which was shown not to be correctly founded by the distinct disclaimer of Mr. Odo Russell of the truth of the reports referred to. A few words upon the style of these despatches, which was extraordinary as the purport. On what possible authority did his noble Friend state?—

"The name of religion has been used as a justification of civil war. We see conflicts of unusual atrocity take place under the pretence of being necessary to vindicate the temporal authority of the Pope."

He (the Marquess of Normanby) said that the whole of the assertions in this paragraph were utterly groundless. The name of religion had never been so used—no contests had been carried on to vindicate the temporal power. Those contests had been the uprising of whole populations, to vindicate their attachment to their native Sovereign, against the usurpation of the invader. Here, then, was a grandiloquent outburst of his noble Friend, to which he should make no exception, but to change two words, and say "Naples" for "Rome," and "Victor Emmanuel" for "the Pope." He (the Marquess of Normanby) would say, with more truth, "Must Naples be the seat of a perpetual foreign occupation? Must brigandage for ever ravage the fertile fields of Southern Italy? God forbid such a calamity! God forbid that Victor Emmanuel should be the instrument of encouraging his countrymen eternally to mutual hatred and sanguinary civil war!" He thought his noble Friend might occupy himself with something that concerned him more than the present spiritual authority of the Pope over the Roman Catholics of Italy and Europe. There were no symptoms of its decay in the meeting of all the most distinguished Prelates of that faith at Rome last year. It was well known that at such a juncture there were always found hired informers, who showed great anxiety to furnish information to parties which it was supposed would be most agreeable for them to receive. But of all instances of this kind he never saw two such simple victims of mystification as the noble Lord opposite and Mr. Odo Russell. He spoke of Mr. Odo Russell with great respect and regard, but he could not say that his late campaign was very brilliant, or added much to the value of his public services. There were, according to Mr. Odo Russell, only 500 brigands in all the Neapolitan territories, and it was not said how many of them had been shot in cold blood, besides those burnt out or destroyed in the villages which had been sacked. Can there be anything more absurd than the gossip with which he entertained General Montebello, stating that the national outbreak which for two years has pervaded the whole Neapolitan territory was produced by individuals going singly to the frontier, where arms and red trousers were sent in "herring barrels" to meet them? How many of these imaginary warriors in red trousers, with German or Spanish names, were found amongst the thousands who were shot in cold blood hundreds of miles from the Roman frontier? His noble Friend, in his despatch to Lord Cowley of the 15th of November, 1862, said—

"The only new argument brought forward by M. Drouyn de Lhuys consists in a reference to the events of 1848 and 1849, and the acquiescence of Her Majesty's Government in the French occupation of Rome at that time. But acquiescence did not imply approbation, still less would approbation then imply approbation now. Your Excellency rightly argued that the whole state of Italy has altered since that time; the state of Lombardy, Modena, Parma, Tuscany, Romagna, Umbria, the Marches, and the kingdom of the two Sicilies has altered; in short, everything has changed, except the French occupation of Rome."

He joined issue with that statement of his noble Friend. King Charles Albert during the revolution of 1848 held Lombardy, but after being defeated by the Austrians he was pelted and hissed out of Milan. Tuscany at that period was a republic. At that time the hands of the revolutionary dial pointed to a different hour in the various Italian States, some being more and others less advanced on that unceasing cycle from destruction to reaction and from reaction back again to destruction, which had been witnessed of late years. On the 3rd of February, 1852, Lord John Russell spoke thus in the House of Commons—

"Four years ago we were astonished with news of insurrections in most of the capitals of Europe, and of a general, or something very like a general, establishment of the most democratic constitutions. I heard hon. Members in this House express their great joy at the establishment of those constitutions; but I could not participate in their joy or praises of what had occurred. I said I looked upon these events with mixed feelings—glad if they should turn out to be events which promoted the liberty and freedom of the nations of Europe, but being by no means confident as to that result. We have now seen four years pass over, and we have witnessed in almost all the countries where these democratic constitutions had been established absolute power put in their place. For instance, in that little country of Tuscany, in which I lived for several months under the benignant rule of a most mild and enlightened Government, we have seen that country overturned by democracy; we have seen the Grand Duke driven from his dominions by the party who seeks what is called Italian unity; and we have afterwards seen that democratic Government suppressed, and the Grand Duke restored to absolute power." [3 Hansard, cix. 102.]

He should like to ask the noble Earl what was the meaning of the most extraordinary public document in which it was stated that the Admiralty had been directed to communicate with Admiral Martin with the view to the placing of a ship of our fleet at the disposal of the Pope? It was most desirable that their Lordships should know the precise circumstances under which that letter was written, in connection with Garibaldi's threatened advance upon Rome. On the opening night of the present Session his noble Friend was reported to have said—

"But I confess that to see two countries, to which such great recollections belong as Greece and Italy, rising again into freedom, independence, and happiness, is a great pleasure to me; and it would, I think, be a great glory to the Government of Great Britain to have contributed to such a result."

Now, where, in all that peninsula, were freedom, independence, and happiness now to be seen? Were not the Italian Government at that very moment plunged in financial ruin, and struggling to extricate themselves by means of an enormous loan? In a paper supposed to act under the inspiration of Her Majesty's Government, The Observer, of last Sunday, there was a letter signed by a prisoner taken at Aspromonte, in which it was stated that nearly 100 Garibaldians were now immured in prison at Palermo, almost in a state of nudity and with chains of 18lb. weight attached to their feet. Condemned to death for being found under the banner of Garibaldi, the sentence of these men had been commuted to the galleys. No wonder if upon this that Government organ, The Observer, remarked—"What shall we say or think of the Government of a country which thus rewards the best and bravest of its citizens?" Without adopting literally such a definition of these men, when the eternal rules of right and wrong had been set at nought systematically by the Piedmontese Government, it was not surprising that those whom that Government had two years ago hailed as Patriot Liberators were now for pursuing the same course by the same Ministers thrown into dungeons and loaded with chains. It must, he thought, also be some drawback to his noble Friend's perfect satisfaction with the result of his Italian policy that he had been unable to relieve the unparalleled sufferings of an English gentleman (Mr. Bishop) now confined in an Italian prison. Within the last week a statement, often before made, and he believed never contradicted—made, too, on the authority of a Parliamentary Commission appointed at Turin—had been repeated in the French Chambers, that within the last two years 7,000 persons had been shot by Piedmontese troops in the Neapolitan territories. Certainly, if his (the Marquess of Normanby's) policy had contributed to one iota of that bloodshed, he should not have looked back to his policy with those feelings of satisfaction which Her Majesty's Government seemed to entertain. He had formerly called attention to these matters, because everything which was likely to displease the Piedmontese Government had until lately been omitted from the papers, and because there was no other way of laying the facts before the world; but there was no longer this state of things existing. Whenever the noble Earl should cease to exercise the functions of Foreign Minister, there would be found among his despatches of the last three or four years so many contradictory expositions of policy that it would be marvellously difficult to know how to reconcile them. They were all intrinsically of the same value, but there was one which should not be forgotten—that in which the noble Earl laid down the principle that the King of Sardinia must recollect that his occupation of territory was merely provisional and no territorial changes should be final without the assent of the Powers of Europe. He purposely abstained from saying anything upon the present state of Italy, but he trusted the time would come when non-intervention, which had been so perverted by the noble Earl, would become a reality and an admitted truth.

EARL RUSSELL:—My Lords, it is certainly somewhat difficult to collect the exact object which my noble Friend has in view. I had understood that his main object was to show that my statement—"that although we acquiesced in the military occupation of Rome in 1848, that acquiescence did not imply approbation"—was unfounded. The notice of my noble Friend made me look into the papers of 1849, and I find such abundant evidence that I was quite right in what I stated that I should weary your Lordships if I attempted to go through a quarter of the documents. But my noble Friend diversified his argument with many—I will not say invectives, but many observations, against the policy which I as the organ of the Government thought it my duty to pursue, and with many criticisms on the Italian Government. With regard to the criticism on the Italian Government, I should say that while it was a question whether that Government would form an established Power in Europe I thought it was incumbent on us, who took a more favourable view of that question, to refute unfounded stories and rumours which were collected from all the absolutist newspapers in Europe, and to set the Italian Government right before this and the other House of Parliament. But the time for that is gone by. The King of Italy has been recognised by Her Majesty, by the Emperor of the French, by the Emperor of Russia, by the King of Prussia, and by the King of Portugal—in short, with the exception of Austria (who has taken her own course and has her own views in reference to this subject), and with the exception of Spain, the King of Italy has been recognised by all the Powers of Europe. Italy, therefore, is now a State of 22,000,000 inhabitants, increasing in commerce, increasing in wealth, enjoying free institutions, and having a Parliament and a press by which the conduct of her Government may be criticised with the utmost freedom. I consequently hold that it would be quite out of place for me now to defend that Government, or to enter upon a discussion of what was right or wrong in dealing with a treasonable conspiracy, or a tumult, in a particular town. I leave that to the Opposition at Turin, and to the Government who have to meet that Opposition. I do not think that we, in this House, need trouble ourselves with the details of the internal Government of Italy. My noble Friend talks of Piedmontese troops, of a Piedmontese army, and of Piedmontese occupation. It is an entire misnomer. Not more than—if quite as much as—40 per cent of the Italian army consists of Piedmontese. It consists of soldiers and officers from Tuscany, from Romagna, from the Neapolitan Provinces, and from Sicily. It is truly an Italian army. Italy has realized that which was so long an object of aspiration to her poets and an object of ambition to her statesmen—a position of independence, and she is as much to be respected and treated as an independent State as any established Power in Europe. With regard to the observations which the noble Marquess made frequently in the course of his speech as to advice which I gave from time to time, whether to the Government of France or whether to the Government of the Pope, I have been misled perhaps by the dictum of my noble Friend. Looking through the correspondence of 1849, I find an opinion which my noble Friend gave to Lord Palmerston in these words—

"If England gives advice consistent with her disinterested desire for the progress of rational liberty, then, if her advice is taken, she has the credit and the satisfaction of having acted up to her principles; and if it is disregarded, it is consistent with her known habits of non-interference to consider that she retires from the affair without discredit."

I have been misled, perhaps, by my noble Friend's authority. I thought it was a canon of British diplomacy, and now that I, as a humble pupil, have endeavoured to follow that direction, my noble Friend comes down and scolds me for being such a pupil, and for giving advice favourable to rational liberty. Then my noble Friend says Lord Palmerston gave an opinion in favour of the Pope being an independent Power. I need not now revert to the different circumstances at the present time; but there does run through the speech of my noble Friend, and, looking at his despatches, there runs through his conduct as Ambassador, a want of perception of the main difference, which Lord Palmerston constantly kept in view; and though it was constantly kept in view by Lord Palmerston, and though Lord Palmerston tried to impress it in the clearest language upon my noble Friend, he seems never to have appreciated that distinction. The distinction is this. Lord Palmerston said it would be very advisable that the Powers should meet and give advice to the Pope and the Roman people—that they should endeavour to induce the Pope to give large reforms and grant a representative Constitution, and that they should advise the people to believe in those promises and to submit to authority. Lord Palmerston said it would be an excellent thing if it could be accomplished in that way; but he said, if that were to be carried into effect by arms, such an intervention, which was bad in principle, would be sure to produce great evils in practice. My noble Friend quoted from the despatch of Lord Palmerston of the 5th of January, 1849, and in the same despatch Lord Palmerston wrote—

"On the other hand, if it be admitted as a general principle that questions and differences between the people and the Sovereign of each State should be left to be settled by those parties without the interference of any foreign armed force, it is not easy to see, in the peculiar position of the Pope with regard to his subjects, what should make the Roman States an exception to this general rule."

Therefore, in the same despatch, Lord Palmerston publicly protested against that intervention, which he properly called "the interference of an armed force." Again, on the 12th of June, Lord Palmerston wrote—

"I have to state that Her Majesty's Government very much regret that a combination of circumstances should have rendered it necessary, in the opinion of the French Government, to order the commander of their expedition to force an entrance into Rome."

Both these are extracts from papers which have been presented to Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY :—My recollection has only been refreshed by such despatches as have been presented to Parliament. I have no access to other documents.

EARL RUSSELL : These despatches which I have now quoted have been presented to Parliament, but I shall be happy to give the whole, or extracts from the despatches which I quote, and which have not been presented to Parliament. In a despatch of July 3, 1849, Lord Palmerston writes to the noble Marquess—

"But in a matter so difficult, and at the same time so important, failure as well as success must be provided for; and her Majesty's Government, therefore, are desirous of knowing what are the views of the French Government as to the course which they contemplate pursuing in the event of such an arrangement as that above mentioned being refused either by the Pope or by the Romans, or by both. It is evident that either of these three contingencies would create a state of things pregnant with results of general and European importance; and Her Majesty's Government would be glad to be informed what are the views which the French Government have formed to themselves thereupon. Her Majesty's Government are not at present in a condition to express any formed opinion on these matters, beyond observing that a prolonged occupation of the city or territory of Rome by the troops of any foreign Power would be, with regard both to its principle and its consequences, a thing much to be deprecated, and greatly to be avoided."

Your Lordships will allow, I think, that when I said acquiescence did not imply approbation, I was not misrepresenting my noble Friend's opinions on this point. About the same time my noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston), in answering a question put to him by Mr. Roebuck in the House of Commons on the 22nd June, stated that the House would see by the papers that had been produced that Her Majesty's Government had from the outset deprecated any armed intervention by foreign Powers in the internal affairs of the Roman States; that they had declined to be parties to the negotiations carried on at that time, and therefore could not speak from certain knowledge as to what had been the course of those negotiations. My noble Friend opposite says there was very little difference between our policy and that of the French Government. We only thought a certain thing ought to be done by negotiation instead of an armed interference; but, instead of that being a slight difference, it is the whole essence of the question at issue. If my noble Friend will excuse me for reading another despatch, I will just read a short extract from one written by Lord Palmerston to Lord Ponsonby at Vienna, dated July 13, 1849. My noble Friend there says—

“A restoration of the Pope to his former unlimited authority by the force of foreign arms, setting aside the injustice of such a measure in point of principle, could only be looked upon as a temporary arrangement. The grievances and abuses which would accompany such a restoration would now be far more forcibly felt by the Roman people than they were at a time when the Romans considered such abuses as their natural inheritance, and when they never had known a better state of things with which to compare them; but now that the Romans have been for many months free from the evils of their former Government, a return to those evils would produce infinitely greater discontent than that which has up to this time existed. It is evident, therefore, that in such a case tranquillity would last only as long as the presence of a sufficient foreign force kept down the discontents of the people, and that whenever that foreign force was removed renewed disturbances would break out; and such a state of things would not be productive of that tranquillity which the Austrian Government must naturally wish to see established in Italy.”

My noble Friend there foretells most clearly the consequences which a foreign occupation would produce, and he points out, that when that foreign force was removed, renewed disturbances would break out, and the tranquillity of Italy would be as much unassured as ever. This is the result of my search into the opinions of my noble Friend at the head of the Government on this point. It certainly shows, that so far from approving of that military occupation, he foresaw the evils that would flow from it; and now, at the end of thirteen or fourteen years, we find that exactly that state of circumstances has arisen which he so sagaciously foretold. My belief is, and it is confirmed by the perusal of these despatches, that the military occupation of Rome was a measure repugnant to the feelings of the Emperor of the French. I believe the Emperor entered into it most unwillingly, and unhappily he has never since seen the time when that occupation could be brought to an end with safety to the Pope or with the favourable opinion of his own people. On the 19th of August the noble Marquess opposite then described to Lord Palmerston the opinion of the then President of the Republic as to the occupation—

“The President, as he was the last to assent to the expedition to Rome, has been the most constant and energetic in his determination that the restoration effected by his means should not be one of pure clerical despotism.”

The reforms which the President expected to result from this occupation were:—

1. A General Amnesty. 2. The Code Napoleon. 3. Liberal Administration. 4. Secularization of Power. Let us see, then, how far these measures have been carried out by the occupation. And here I will say, notwithstanding the observations which my noble Friend opposite has made on this point, that I consider that as a Member of the English Parliament, setting aside any official capacity, I have a perfect right to criticise and to blame the act of any foreign Government which I think inconsistent with the general principles of international law, or liable to produce general evils. It certainly is my opinion that the military occupation of Rome, being, as every one allows, an act contrary to the general principles of international law, has been a misfortune to France, whose generous efforts in favour of Italy have thus been rendered liable to misconstruction. But what were the first consequences of that occupation? Did the reforms take place which my noble Friend says were looked forward to from this occupation, and for which the President of the Republic was so anxious? In the same year a despatch was communicated to this Government, which gives a pretty good answer to that question. It has never been included in any of the documents laid before Parliament; but I do not think there can be any mischief in reading it now. It is a despatch from the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. de Tocqueville, to M. de la Cour, his minister at Vienna. M. de Tocqueville says—

“The complete re-establishment of the abuses which had been most decried under the old régime; wholesale destitution; the placing under suspicion of all public functionaries, whose conduct during the continuance of the Republican Government is submitted to an odious inquisition; the disgrace or exile of men who, while refusing to acknowledge the revolutionary power, have manifested liberal sentiments; in some provinces measures of terror which seem to belong to other times—such are the chief acts which have inaugurated the restoration of the Pontifical Government; and everything indicated that this Government, left to itself, or rather to the fatal influences which dominate it, would go still farther in this deplorable direction. As for the reforms so often promised, they are limited as yet to vague declarations, the significance of which each fresh explanation tends to lessen."

I must say that this correspondence confirmed me in one opinion, which I had long entertained—namely, that the Papal Government is conducted on principles totally different from those of other civilized Governments which prevail in our day. The Government of the Pope is founded on this principle—and the present Pope, benevolent as he is, has acted on it—that the Government is strictly a paternal one; that its subjects are to be treated as if they were children; that nothing is to be taught different from what orthodox Catholic doctrine would sanction; and that with regard to discussion in the press, none ought to be allowed which tends to create doubt in men's minds. Then, with regard to the punishment of crime, it is conducted on the principle that the object of criminal justice is not so much to punish persons guilty of murder and other atrocious crimes as to bring them to a state of repentance and reformation. Expectations of the amendment and reformation of the worst of criminals are indulged in by the Government of Rome, though no other Government would expect much in that way from men who had committed half a dozen murders and perhaps twenty other crimes of an aggravated character. A Roman Catholic Gentleman, a Member of the other House of Parliament, has published an account of his travels through Rome, in which he states that nothing can be more benevolent than the conduct of the Pope. He says that his Holiness went from one hospital to another doing various acts of kindness to the patients, whom he treated as his children. This may be; but the administration of criminal justice is so bad under the Papal Government as to be unparalleled by that of any other country in enlightened Europe. If you look to any of the great countries of Europe—if you look to France or Austria—you will find that they act on a totally different principle; on the principle that their subjects must be left to follow their own religious convictions, and that in the ordinary business of life they must be left to regulate their own fate. It is therefore, I believe, quite impossible that the Government of the Pope can ever be assimilated to those of the other countries of Europe; the subjects of the Pope are justified in complaining that they are ill-governed; and to maintain such a Government by force is only to give up the Roman people for all time to bad institutions such as those from which they at present suffer. Here are a considerable population who are ill-governed, who are kept in darkness; and when they wish for freedom, it is not a just action, it is not a politic action, to keep them by the force of another Power from the accomplishment of their desires. My noble Friend has said a great deal of the wishes of the Italian people; but the Italian people have made a Government for themselves; and if the Roman people were allowed to join them, there is nothing they would like so well as to join the rest of Italy, and to enjoy the strong Government which the rest of Italy enjoys. My noble Friend, in speaking of these matters, referred to one or two instances of what he considered cruel conduct on the part of the Italian Government. One was the case of Mr. Bishop. Now, there is no matter in which I have taken more pains than in that of endeavouring to have justice done to Mr. Bishop. He was fairly tried, and he was condemned to what was thought to be a cruel punishment. That, however, was the sentence of a duly constituted tribunal; but the mercy of the King has interposed so far that that portion of the sentence by which Mr. Bishop was condemned to hard labour has been remitted. He is now confined in a fortress where he is able to exercise. The tribunal before which he was tried was, I believe, a perfectly legal one. It is not for me to say whether the conclusion arrived at was one in accordance with Italian law; but it is in accordance with the custom prevailing all over Europe that persons found guilty of conspiracy in the crime of high treason should suffer for it. I may observe, that the present state of Italy is, after all, the state which was desired three centuries ago by the most acute and able of her political leaders. It is the state which was predicted over and over again by French Ambassadors at Rome. I hope the notice of my noble Friend has been attracted to a book or pamphlet lately published in France called The Temporal Government Judged by French Diplomacy, in which are to be found the opinions of French Ambassadors, from the 17th century down, to the Roman Government. In 1814 or 1815 the French

Ambassador told his Government that the dissatisfaction excited by the Papal Government would necessarily create a desire for Italian unity, but that Italians could do nothing of themselves; that they only spoke and wrote and complained; but he added, that if ever a great Power came to their assistance, the yoke which they all detested would be thrown off. We have seen the realization of these prophecies in part; we have seen Italy become an Independent State, except for the foreign occupation of Rome. I believe that foreign occupation will cease as soon as the French people see that they are not doing justice to the Italians by continuing it, and I believe the Emperor will be the first to hail that opinion of the French people; and then I hope—though my noble Friend may think me wrong—that the Pope may take refuge in Malta, or in Spain or Austria, or any other place where he may think he would be most independent. With reference to the offer which my noble Friend condemns, I will remind him that the Pope sent for Mr. Odo Russell. For what reason he did so on that occasion I cannot tell; but he did send for Mr. Odo Russell, and spoke to him at great length on the state of Italy and on the progress of Garibaldi, and his apprehension that that progress might be carried still farther. He then asked Mr. Russell pointedly whether, in case he should take refuge in British territory, he would be hospitably received. My noble Friend thinks I was wrong in giving an answer to that question; but, my Lords, considering the venerable character of the Pope—considering that he is impelled by his conscience not to give those reforms which he is asked for, I cannot think I was wrong in offering him an asylum in British territory, where he would be perfectly safe and free from all disturbance and danger. I know the Pope expressed himself in terms of grateful acknowledgment for the proffered hospitality of England while stating that it was not his intention to accept it at the present moment. In conclusion, my Lords, I have only to reiterate my opinion that it would be for the benefit of the Italians and of Europe if Rome should become the capital of Italy and cease to be the ground of foreign occupation.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH:—My Lords, I do not think that any practical advantage can be gained by referring to transactions which took place thirteen

or fourteen years ago; and upon this occasion I only wish, in regard to a very recent occurrence, to express the very great satisfaction with which I have observed the conduct of the Administration—the really Italian Administration—which has of late been appointed by the King of Italy, in declining at present to enter into any negotiations with respect to what is called the Roman Question. In adopting that course, they are acting with a true sense of the dignity of the country they represent. They justly appreciate its interests, and they are almost for the first time showing that firm independence of feeling on which alone Italy must rely for the respect of foreign nations and for that consideration which she ought to enjoy. I see that in one of the French Chambers it has been declared that at Turin they no longer talk of Rome. But is it because they no longer talk that they no longer think? The people of Italy generally think the more of Rome because they speak of it so little; but instead of endeavouring by negotiation with the Emperor of the French to effect their object, they determine to obtain its ultimate accomplishment by giving a thoroughly good government to their country and by making her strong in arms. I am convinced that if the Italian Government—and I see with satisfaction that the Italian Parliament have shown from the first an aptitude for the adoption of Parliamentary government which has not been exhibited by the possessors of other recent constitutions—I am convinced that if the Italian Government determine by every means in their power, by reforming and perfecting their institutions, to establish throughout Italy a strong constitutional system, if they succeed in inspiring every Italian with gratitude to the government for benefits received, and if the Italian people are prepared to stand by them in every effort they may be required to make for the preservation of Italian independence, if they show in the very confines of that mediæval despotism which exists in Rome a steady adherence to a really good government, even on the very side of the hill from which the bandit looks down—I say it will be impossible in the presence of that contrast for all Europe not to combine in admitting the Italians to Rome. I was glad to hear the noble Earl (Earl Russell) state—and I entirely agree with him upon the point—that it is impossible to believe that a man of sense and judgment like the present Emperor of the French can, in his own mind, have any hesitation as to the course which it is most for the interest of France to pursue in this case. He may not feel himself strong enough at home to do that which he thinks right, but he must have a desire to consummate and complete the great work which he commenced—to do that which more than anything he has yet achieved will in distant ages tend to his honour and immortality—namely, to establish in the South of Europe a new great State, which, in the natural exercise of its independence, will more than any event which has taken place for more than a century conduce to the future peace and tranquillity of Europe. This is my conviction; and we must not forget that it is a matter of the very highest importance, not only to every Roman Catholic State, but to every State which has Roman Catholic subjects, that the Pope should be restored to real independence. This is the universal object of all Italy. I cannot consider that the present position of the Pope is one that conduces to the respect of the Roman Catholic world. I cannot think it conduces to the free and legitimate exercise of that valuable authority which he possesses over a very large portion of Christian Europe. The time will come when this occupation of Rome by France will cease. It is contrary to the interests of France herself; it is contrary to the interests of Europe; and that which may now for a time be postponed by what is called Roman Catholic feeling in France will at no distant period be called for by the universal feeling of the whole body of Roman Catholics throughout Europe. I look forward to the time when the Pope, restored to real independence, may exercise his authority in the Vatican while the Parliament of free Italy conducts its deliberations in the Capitol.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY made a brief reply, which was inaudible.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, February 17, 1863.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN.—FOR DEVONPORT, William Ferrand, esquire.
SELECT COMMITTEES.—Inland Revenue and Customs Establishments, appointed; Private Bill Legislation, appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1.—Prison Ministers [Bill 24]. Considered as amended.—Illegitimate Children (Ireland) [Bill 13].

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

LORD FERMOY said, he rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He objected to the Bill on account of the mode in which it was introduced. He contended also that it involved a proposition interfering with the social rights of the people. If any such measure were introduced, it ought to be brought forward by her Majesty's Government, and ought to extend over the whole country. The effect of this Bill would be to repeal a number of Acts of Parliament and to do that only so far as related to Liverpool. It proposed, in short, to establish complete free trade in licensing in that town, inasmuch as, if passed into a law, the magistrates would under its operation be obliged to grant licences to any number of persons in a street who were the occupiers of houses of the value of £50 per annum, and who could not be proved to be of bad character; so that the whole or any smaller number of houses in a particular locality might be converted into public-houses almost at pleasure. Now, he was as earnest an advocate of the principles of free trade as any man who listened to him; but the system of thus licensing houses in towns was one into which, in his opinion, it ought not to enter. The magistrates ought, he thought, to have it in their power to take into account, over and above the facts that the man applying for a licence lived in a house of the value of £50 and had not garrotted anybody, the additional consideration whether it was for the good of society in the place that the licence should be granted. If the Bill received the assent of the House, the result would be that the magistrates would be subject to the alternative of either granting a licence to everybody, or of rendering themselves liable to a mandamus to compel them to do so. The fact was, the question had at Liverpool, as he understood, been made a party one; and if that were so, he thought it was a great mistake. The noble Lord concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. HORSFALL said, he would beg leave to assure the noble Lord that he had fallen into a great mistake in supposing that this had been made a party question at Liverpool. The necessity for the Bill had arisen in the difference of opinion which existed among the magistracy of Liverpool with respect to the granting of licences; one section being desirous that certain restrictions should be imposed in such cases, while there was another section disposed to grant licences almost indiscriminately. To obviate the difficulties which were in consequence occasioned, it was deemed desirable that the present Bill should be brought in, and he thought the provisions of it would commend themselves to every hon. Member who read them. It would be found that the persons applying for licences should not only be of good character, but should find sureties for their good conduct. It was also required that no licence should be granted to a house rated at less than £50 per annum, and the cost of the new licences was to be £30 each per annum, while as to existing licences it was agreed that fourteen years should elapse before parties now possessing licences should be called upon to pay the higher rate for them. The Bill was mainly framed on the Resolutions of a Committee of that House which sat in 1854. As to the advisability of such a measure being introduced for the whole country, the particular circumstances of each locality should be taken into account; for instance, in Liverpool 1,540 licences had been granted, while in Manchester, with a larger population, there were only 600; and on a recent occasion 124 new licences had been granted in Liverpool, while at Manchester almost every licence was refused. The Bill was not a Bill promoted by the licensed victuallers of Liverpool, but it had received the general support of the people of the town; and he believed that only one petition had been presented, and that not against it, but in favour of a clause being inserted for the purpose of requiring all public-houses to be closed on Sundays. He trusted, therefore, that the House would allow the Bill to proceed.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the important principle involved in reading a second time as a Private Bill the measure under discussion. It could not, he found, looking at the Standing Orders, which embraced forty different categories under which Private Bills might be ranged, be classed under any one of them, while there were several rules relative to the bringing-in of public Bills which had been evaded by its introduction in its present shape, inasmuch as it proposed wholly to alter certain general regulations relating to the revenue and the conduct of trade. Every measure of that nature ought to be introduced in a Committee of the Whole House; and further, any measure which imposed a charge upon the people ought to be submitted to that House on the responsibility of the Government and with the assent of the Crown. The Bill had not been so introduced, and he therefore thought it ought not to be proceeded with any further. The question for the House to consider was, whether, by assenting to the second reading of the Bill as it stood, they were prepared to take the first step in the substitution of private for public legislation on the subject of licensing. The law, he maintained, on the subject was sufficiently intelligible; and if magistrates chose to quarrel among themselves when called upon to execute it, the course to pursue was to appeal to the Lord Chancellor for redress.

MR. MASSEY said, the objection of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) was that the Bill ought to have been introduced by a Resolution of a Committee of the Whole House. No doubt Bills of a public character relating to money or taxation ought to be founded upon a Resolution of a Committee of the Whole House. The reasons for such a regulation were somewhat antiquated; but however forcible they were, and although the regulation had been established long before Private Bills existed, it was not thought expedient to extend it to Private Bills. The objection, therefore, of the hon. Gentleman, he thought, wholly untenable. It had been also argued that the measure would establish the principle of exceptional legislation, which was said to be highly objectionable upon such a question as that involved. But it could not be denied that the principle of exceptional legislation had already been laid down in regard to particular bodies and individuals. The question, then, arose whether there was anything in the matter entitling the people of Liverpool to be heard before a Committee above stairs. He thought there was. Liverpool contained a population of nearly 500,000. An immense trade and commerce were carried on within the town. The magistrates of the place had expressed themselves favourable to the enactment of such a measure of police as the present Bill really was. The Bill, too, was mainly founded upon the Report of the Committee of 1854. Under all those circumstances he thought it was only reasonable that the promoters should have the power of satisfying a Committee upstairs, if they could do so, that Liverpool was entitled to this special legislation.

MR. HARDY said, the more he considered the measure the more satisfied was he in his own mind, that it was not a question that ought to be referred to a Select Committee. He denied that the recommendations of the Committee of 1853 and 1854 were in favour of a measure of the kind under consideration. So far from the proceedings of that Committee being a ground for enacting such a measure as the present, they went to show that the difficulties in the licensing system were such as to demand a general Bill upon the subject. The measure was not merely one of police regulation, it involved the comfort and happiness of a whole population; it involved considerations of the most serious and important character. He thought that they would be establishing one of the worst precedents if they referred a matter of such a character to a Committee of five Gentlemen upstairs, who would deal with it as they thought fit, and only afford the House the opportunity of deciding upon so momentous a question upon the third reading of the Bill. It should be also recollected that the Bill was one for which the Government were actually waiting in order to found a precedent. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department had told them that he was delaying his own general licensing Bill until he saw the result of the present proceedings—that he was preparing a measure to apply to the licensing system of the whole Kingdom. Why, then, should that exceptional legislation be proceeded with? It was impossible to form a fair judgment of the results of the working of such a measure as the present until it had been for years and years in operation. In conclusion, he should oppose the second reading of the Bill on the ground that the system of licensing extending over a population of half a million of people was not one that ought to be decided by a Committee of five Gentlemen above stairs, but ought to be established by a public Bill, and submitted to Parliament in such a shape as would afford the fullest opportunities for the consideration of its principles and their effects upon the country generally. With the greatest reluctance, he felt himself compelled to oppose the Motion for a second reading.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had no intention of adopting in any measure with reference to the licensing system the principle of the Bill before the House.

MR. J. C. EWART said, that there was no quarrel among the magistrates of Liverpool. No petition had been presented against the Bill, which had been brought forward with the general approbation of the inhabitants of Liverpool. He hoped, therefore, that the House would allow the Bill to go to the Committee upstairs.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that notwithstanding the observations of the hon. Member (Mr. Hardy), the present measure was essentially one of police regulation regarding the licensing system of Liverpool. The great reason why they enacted regulations regarding public-houses, was to protect as far as possible the morality of the people. Now, a police Bill might be very applicable to certain large localities, though not quite suited to the entire kingdom. Considering that the magistrates of Liverpool were desirous of the Bill proceeding, he thought it would be too bad to refuse the promoters an opportunity of establishing their claim for special legislation before a Committee of the House, where it would be equally open to the opponents of the measure to show cause against it. As to the objection of the hon. Member (Mr. Hardy), that the question involved was far too important to be settled by a Committee of five Gentlemen, that objection might be removed by a special Motion to refer the Bill after it had passed the Select Committee to a Committee of the Whole House, as had been done on certain extraordinary occasions. He (Sir George Grey) believed the principle of the measure to be valuable; and should it be found applicable to Liverpool, he thought it would go far to remove objections to the licensing system generally.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought a great question arose upon the proposed mode of legislation. A few years ago they had the same thing tried in respect to Manchester education. In considering that Bill the great inconvenience was felt of enacting a general principle by means of a local Bill. The same objection precisely applied to the present state of things. He thought that the subject was one which ought to be dealt with generally. He was at a loss to know by what process they could make this a hybrid Bill, by having it referred to a Committee of the Whole House after it had come down from the Committee of five Gentlemen upstairs, as the right hon. Baronet suggested. If the principle of the measure were sound, and the Government were prepared to justify it, the right hon. Baronet ought himself to introduce a general measure on the subject. If they assented to the second reading of the Bill, they would have given a quasi approval to the measure. To a certain degree they would then find their hands tied when they came to discuss the provisions of a general Bill upon what must be admitted to be a difficult subject and one of great interest to the general community. He was therefore disposed to vote against the Motion, because he did not think there was any ground shown in favour of exceptional legislation for Liverpool. The regulation of public-houses was a general principle applicable to the whole country, and he did not see any reason why Liverpool should be legislated for on a principle wholly different from every other part of the kingdom.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary no doubt contemplated introducing a Bill to apply to the whole country. At the same time, he contended that the passing of one general measure for the whole kingdom was a very different thing to the consideration of a Bill only applicable to the peculiar circumstances of Liverpool. Now, there were peculiar circumstances in the condition of Liverpool which would make it an exceedingly hard case for the traders of that town if they refused its demand for exceptional legislation. The magistrates of Liverpool had acted generally for some years past on the principle of open or free licences, and it was their practice to give licences, not on the principle which was usually observed by magistrates elsewhere, of according a certain supply of liquor to a certain amount of population, but they acted on the principle of giving licences with great freedom to all applicants who were judged qualified to conduct the business of publicans with respectability. What, then, was the effect of the system adopted by the Liverpool magistrates on the condition of the publicans? On the one hand, they continued under the old burdens in which the trade had been kept. Those who kept the old houses were still obliged to pay the factitious rents and extravagant prices for the goodwill, &c., of the establishments. On the other hand, they did not obtain the advantage accorded by the old system as administered by the magistrates of the country generally. They were, then, exposed to an unlimited amount of competition, but were denied the advantage of the law where it had been altered. Under those circumstances the Committee that sat some years ago on the subject recommended the adoption of a system totally different to that which now prevailed. The recommendations of such Committee were in a great measure embodied in the present Bill. He therefore thought that a fair case had been shown for the second reading.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought that the arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer proved rather too much. They went rather to support the views of his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) than to afford reasons for proceeding with the present Bill; for if the Committee referred to had recommended alterations in the law as applicable to the entire kingdom, then those alterations should be made co-extensive with the whole population. He owned he felt the gravest objections to private legislation of the kind. In the Manchester education case it was very properly contended that the great principle therein involved ought to be submitted to Parliament in the shape of a Public Bill, and not to be introduced to the House under cover of a Private Bill. The House ultimately confirmed that view. His right hon. Friend had made one very important admission. It seemed now that the Bill was not brought in by the Corporation of Liverpool, but at the recommendation of the publicans of Liverpool. He must say he did not think that an authority on which the House should be asked to adopt exceptional legislation.

SOUTH EASTERN RAILWAY BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JAMES DUKE moved that the Bill be now read the second time. The object of the Bill was to shorten the time consumed in the transit between this country and the Continent. He trusted that the House would not, on account of the opposition to the measure, object to the second reading, but would say that the opposition should be heard and determined on by a Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. DODSON said, he rose to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. In so doing he wished to disclaim being actuated by private interest, or hostility to the promoters, the South Eastern Railway Company. The object of the Bill was to take power to make a branch line about two miles long near Folkstone Harbour, the alleged advantage of which was that it would shorten the distance to London three-quarters of a mile in the whole distance of eighty-three miles. The existing arrangements had been deemed sufficient from the formation of the line up to two years ago, when the Bill passed for the formation of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway. In 1861 the South Eastern Company brought in a Bill, which was opposed by Sir John Bligh on the ground that the projected branch would pass within 100 yards of his house, and separate the house from the entrance lodge; by General Hankey, because the branch would pass within twelve yards of his house, cut through his kitchen garden and offices, and, in fact, render the house uninhabitable; by the Corporation of Folkestone, and by other parties, on the ground that it would destroy the lower road to Sandgate. Lord Radnor, whose property would be traversed by the proposed branch, was also an opponent of that Bill. The Bill passed the House of Commons; but on being taken to the Lords a Select Committee of their Lordships threw it out, and that without calling on the opponents to open their case. That Bill the company had revived. The Bill before the House was to construct a branch railway between the same points as those of the Bill of 1861; and it was open to the same objections as the former Bill, except in one respect only—namely, that Lord Radnor, formerly an opponent, having made terms with the company, had withdrawn his opposition. There was an important difference in the present circumstances and those of the Bill of 1861—that the opponents of the Bill suggested an alternative line, not of greater length, and with the same advantages as that of the promoters; but that suggestion had been rejected by the promoters on the ground that it would entail a larger expense. The promoters had declared, that if defeated, they would renew their application again and again till they wore out the opposition. He asked the House whether, in the absence of any new advantages, they were prepared to allow the opponents of a Bill to be again put to the trouble and expense they were put to in 1861? If so, it would be establishing the principle that the longest purse would win, the game being "beggar my neighbour," and the better plan would be for the parties, instead of submitting their differences to Committees, to place their purses in the scales, and the owner of the purse which kicked the beam to give in.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. GILPIN contended that the statement of the hon. Member for Sussex ought to induce the House not to refuse to read the Bill a second time, but specially to refer it to investigation before a Committee. Had the hon. Member investigated the alternative line? In all probability he had not. He (Mr. Gilpin) had, and he was therefore in a position to deny that it was equally good with that of the promoters. If the hon. Member argued, that because a Bill which had passed the Commons had been rejected by the Lords, it ought not to be reintroduced into the Commons, he could understand the logic, but he should entirely dissent from the conclusion. In 1861 the Bill passed the Commons, notwithstanding the opposition of Lord Radnor, the largest landowner whose property was affected by the measure; but that opposition was now withdrawn, and to that extent the present circumstances were better than those of 1861.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, that this was one of those cases which the House would be called upon some time or other to meet by general legislation. A strong feeling prevailed not only in the country, but in that House, that these unseemly conflicts between Committees and private parties should be terminated, and that it was unjust to permit wealthy companies to come before Parliament year after year with the view of exhausting the patience and the pockets of private individuals opposed to their schemes.

MR. NORRIS remarked that the entire merits of the case were sifted with more than ordinary strictness before a Committee in 1861, when the Bill received the sanction of the House, but was afterwards rejected by the Lords. If, then, there was a conflict at all, it was between the Committees of the two Houses.

MR. MASSEY said, he should be unwilling that any measure which had been deliberately decided upon should be re-introduced when heavy expenses were involved. He must maintain, however, that a Committee of the Commons was quite as competent as a Committee of the Lords to decide upon the merits of the Bill; and as the Commons passed the Bill in 1861 he thought it ought to be again adopted. It was said that landowners were opposed to the Bill. Their case was fully heard by the Commons' Committee in 1861. It was not a case in which a decision had been pronounced by the House on a previous occasion adversely to the promoters; and if the Bill were not now allowed to proceed, the company, and not private landowners, would be the aggrieved parties, because the company were successful in 1861.

MR. LYGON said, that having been on the Committee in 1861, he could bear witness that the Bill was thoroughly investigated. It had been stated that there was a conflict between the Lords and Commons; and it was therefore right that the House should know that the Committee of the Commons was divided in opinion on the subject. The question seemed to him to be really this, whether a railway with large resources was to come again and again to Parliament and wear out the opposition by the enormous expenses.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that he had allowed his name to be placed on the back of the Bill, which he would not have done if it had not been a case in which public interests were involved. The largest of the three landowners who opposed in 1861 did not oppose now; indeed, the Bill was not the same as that then before the House; and if the House refused to send it upstairs, the company would be placed in an unfair position.

COLONEL KNOX said, that the company had not made any proposition to conciliate their opponents except in one instance. The Bill proposed to go through the grounds and houses of gentlemen both resident and non-resident; and as he did not think twenty minutes could be saved by three quarters of a mile of railway, he hoped the House would take a more generous view than the hon. Member who had just sat down, and reject the Bill.

SIR BROOK BRIDGES said, that he knew the locality, and he did not wish the House to be misled in regard to the importance of the public interests involved. It was allowed by the supporters of the measure that the distance saved would be only three-quarters of a mile; and they also said that it was impossible to save more than a quarter of an hour; but it was rather difficult to conceive how a quarter of an hour could be saved by three-quarters of a mile. With reference to the private interests involved, they had before them the fact that in all important particulars it was precisely the same proposition that had been before the House on previous occasions, and it destroyed the privacy of two residential proprietors merely for a saving of three-quarters of a mile. It was true that at the end of a long period of agitation one of the largest proprietors had agreed with the company, but he was not a residential proprietor; and was it to be in the power of one large landowner, by thus agreeing with a company, to injure smaller proprietors, unless the interests of the public were really involved? If they were involved, the case would come before the House on a very different footing. The opponents of the measure were put in a very unfair and disadvantageous position on the score of expense. They spent £5,000 in proving their case before a perfectly unexceptionable tribunal; the Bill passed the Committee of that House only by the casting vote of one Member; and it was thrown out of the other House. Therefore, the preponderance of authority was against it; and the company ought to have adopted the alternative route, at the larger expense, rather than have involved the parties in the expense they had been put to and would be put to in again opposing the measure.

Mr. WHALLEY said, that the facts just mentioned exhibited a feature of private legislation which demanded immediate revision, and illustrated the necessity of that railway tribunal the creation of which he advocated a few nights before. He trusted that the Government measure on the subject would include a remedy by which the expenses of proceedings in regard to Private Bills would be reduced so as to give fair play to the opponents of such a Bill as this when contending against a great company.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

RESOLUTION MOVED.

Mr. R. HODGSON said, that he rose to move the Resolution of which he had given notice, on the subject of the fees on private Bills. If, however, it were understood that the Bill to be introduced on the Report of the Committee of last Session were to have a retrospective effect, he was ready to withdraw his Motion. That Bill he thought ought to apply to the measures of this Session, because it was a monstrous injustice that the promoters of Bills should be mulcted of the fees they were called upon to pay. He did not believe that the House generally knew the amount of the fees or the principles on which they were charged. The fees against which he proposed to direct his Resolution were those paid on the different stages of a private Bill as it passed through that House. He believed that the ordinary expenses of an unopposed Bill which did not give authority to raise more than £50,000 amounted to £100. On the presentation of the petition for the Bill £5 was paid; on the first reading, £15; on the second reading, £15; on the report of the Committee, £15; and on the third reading £15. If the promoters of a private Bill asked power to raise from £50,000 to £100,000, the fees were trebled, though no more trouble was given in passing the Bill. In some cases, where, for example, the promoters sought to raise £1,000,000, the charges were more than ten times the amount of fees which they would be required to pay if they asked to raise only £10,000. None of the witnesses examined before the Committee of last Session could explain the principle upon which these exorbitant fees were charged. In 1847, when a charge was introduced, the fees were assessed upon an unintelligible system. The only object seemed to be to secure that in some way or other something like the same amount of fees should be raised. On that account, he presumed, the ad valorem principle was applied to private Bills. The consequence was that not the same amount of fees, but a much larger amount, had been raised since 1847. In one year the amount raised by fees was £220,000, which not only paid the expenses of the establishment, but gave the Chancellor of the Exchequer £170,000; and the year before, when £76,000 was raised, the Chancellor of Exchequer received £16,000. That was a gross injustice to the promoters of Bills. He did not propose to interfere with the fees paid to solicitors and others under Act of Parliament, or by order of the Speaker. He was not a speculator in railways. He was connected with the management of one simply for the reason that it was connected with the neighbourhood wherein he resided. It was in low circumstances when he joined the direction in the hope of improving it. Since that time, and during the last eight years, the shares stood at 120 per cent higher than they did. He wished to explain to the House that it was not from any trade interest in railways that he acted in this matter, but because from his experience he knew that the cost of Private Bills was a crying evil and an injustice which the House ought to abolish. He would therefore conclude by moving his Resolution.

Mr. HADFIELD said, he rose to second the Motion. He could not but condemn the practice of levying enormous costs upon the promoters of Bills which were for the public benefit. The expense was terrible—it was frightful. In 1854, according to Returns for which he moved, the various railway companies had expended £20,000,000 in promoting Acts of Parliament. So, when a gentleman came to this House for the purpose of protecting his property, he had to pay all the expense he incurred even if he gained his case. He asked that an end might be put to this state of things. There were other things which ought to be inquired into—the mode in which business was done by counsel. It was high time that some system of taxation should be employed in order to put some limit to their fees, which they often took, although engaged in half a dozen Committees sitting at the same time. He trusted the House would adopt the Resolution, not only for its own sake, but as a means of leading to the adoption of a new system.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That so much of the Table of Fees charged at the House of Commons (under the Standing Order of the House passed in 1852) as multiplies the Fees Payable on the Petition, First, Second, and Third Readings, and Report of Private Bills, according to the money to be raised or expended under the authority of such Bills, be rescinded—the reduction to take effect in respect of Private Bills introduced in the Present Session.”

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, there could be no doubt that the question of fees paid by the promoters of Private Bills was one well worthy of consideration; but he very much questioned whether the House would think itself in a condition to bind itself, at that moment, by a positive Resolution to cut down to a certain amount the fees as proposed by the hon. Member. His hon. Friend proposed to cut down the fee fund to the extent probably of one-half. He did not know whether an exact calculation had been made, but he thought he was under the mark when he said that by the remission of fees proposed the fund would be diminished at least a half. It was reasonable, undoubtedly, that persons promoting Private Bills, seeking for something for their own special advantage, and coming to Parliament for privileges, as it were, for themselves, should defray the additional expense incurred by Parliament in meeting their wishes; but undoubtedly it was unjust to ask them to pay more. But that night he proposed to ask the House of Commons to agree to a Committee to inquire into the subject of private legislation, with a view to the diminution of the expense, and undoubtedly the question of fees must come within the scope of that inquiry. He therefore thought it would be premature at that time to commit themselves by a Resolution of the kind; and he thought his hon. Friend would act judiciously if he would not press his Motion, but allow the whole subject to be inquired into by the Committee.

Mr. Hadfield

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that while he concurred in much that had fallen from his hon. Friend in support of his Resolution, he would suggest that his hon. Friend should accede to the proposal to withdraw his Motion. Having taken an active part to get these fees reduced, he well recollected that one recommendation of the Committee of last Session was, that as the fees were higher than needful, they ought to be reduced; and that Committee also recommended the subject to the attention of a Committee of this House in the next Session of Parliament. As his right hon. Friend had stated that he intended to move for such Committee, it would be premature to pass the Resolution at that moment.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he was of opinion that the whole subject of Private Bill legislation demanded the fullest investigation.

MR. HODGSON said, he would withdraw his Motion on the understanding that the Committee referred to was to be moved for.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCE OF WALES. QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Government are prepared to bring in a Bill for making commercial engagements falling due on the wedding day of the Prince of Wales payable as is by law provided for Christmas Day, so as to enable Her Majesty's subjects to enjoy the day of that auspicious event as a general holiday?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am sorry to inform my hon. Friend that the Government have no intention to bring in a Bill for that purpose. Any unnecessary interference with the arrangements of the commerce of the country is a thing to be avoided. Moreover, there is no precedent for such a measure as suggested.

THE ROYAL NAVY—THE “ROYAL OAK” AND THE “ROYAL SOVEREIGN”

QUESTION.

MR. LAIRD said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, The date when the iron-cased ship Royal Oak is expected to be ready for sea; and whether, in order to test the sea-going capabilities of a wood-built vessel cased with heavy armour plates, it is the intention of the Admiralty to commission her for service as soon as she is ready; and also, the date when the Royal Sovereign was ordered to be cut down and altered into a cupola ship, and probable time of completion for trial; also, what armament it is proposed she is to carry?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the Royal Oak was expected to be out of the hands of the dockyard authorities on the 19th of March, and she would be commissioned immediately for service. The Royal Sovereign was ordered to be cut down on the 3rd of April, 1862, but her armament had not yet been decided upon; neither could he state exactly when she would be ready. He trusted, however, that she would be completed by the end of the year.

RAILWAY PROXIES.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is not the case that proxy papers for voting in public companies require a sixpenny stamp; whether he is aware that any committee of shareholders seeking a reform in the company are placed at a great disadvantage in comparison with the Directors, in having to pay for large numbers of proxy stamps, while the Directors can charge that expense to the Company; and, considering that the exercise of a franchise is in question, whether the principle of a penny stamp, as now applied to cheques and other instruments, may not be a sufficient amount of taxation to impose upon proxy papers?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, no representations had been made to him as to the inconvenience experienced by the shareholders of railway or other companies in consequence of proxy papers requiring a sixpenny stamp. If inconvenience arose from the practice of the Directors charging the expense of these proxies to the funds of the Company, the proper course to pursue was for the shareholders to prevent them so charging the expense, or by establishing for themselves the right of having proxies without limit at the general expense. He had no information which led him to believe there was any case for a change in the law with respect to the duty on proxies. A short time ago they were liable to the same duty as a power of attorney—namely, 30s.; then the duty was reduced to 2s. 6d., and finally to 6d.; and it was the opinion of those well informed on the subject that that was a low charge considering the nature of the functions, and that nothing was to be gained by an alteration.

SALE OF BEER BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. P. W. MARTIN said, he wished to inquire of the hon. Member for Bradford, Whether it was his intention to re-introduce the Sale of Beer Bill during the present Session?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that after the declaration of the Home Secretary of his intention to bring in a Bill dealing with the general question of licences, he did not propose to re-introduce his Sale of Beer Bill of last Session until he had seen the right hon. Gentleman's measure.

UNITED STATES—BLOCKADE OF CHARLESTON.—QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, he rose to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government are in possession of any official information on the subject of the reported defeat by the Confederates of the blockading squadron at the mouth of the Charleston river; and, if so, whether that information is of a character to raise the question of the legality of the future blockade of that port?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Her Majesty's Government have no information with regard to that transaction, other than that which has been conveyed by the telegrams which have been received, and are known to everybody. Those telegrams simply state that the blockade was raised on the morning of one day and re-imposed on the succeeding day. [An hon. MEMBER: On the same day.] The same information states the raising of the blockade and its renewal. With regard to the application of the general law of nations to a transaction of that kind I shall abstain from giving any opinion, because the application of that law depends so much upon the circumstances of the case, that till that which has really happened is well known, it would be improper for Her Majesty's Government to commit themselves to any binding opinion as to the effect which those transactions may have.

METROPOLITAN BUILDINGS—FINSBURY CIRCUS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he has received a deputation of the inhabitants of Finsbury Circus to solicit his support against the proposed extension of the Great Eastern Railway; if so, whether he has promised that support; and, in such a case, if he will state what supervision his Department possesses over projects of a similar nature within the metropolis?

MR. COWPER said, that a number of gentlemen who were in the habit of walking in Finsbury Circus, and who attached great importance to the preservation of the semi-rural character of that place, had done him the honour to call upon him, with the wish to enlist his sympathies with regard to the grievance which they anticipated was coming upon them. They stated that the Great Eastern Railway Company contemplated placing a station in the centre of Finsbury Circus, which had hitherto been a very quiet spot in the centre of the City of London. They added that it was almost the only place where persons who were obliged to reside in the City could live away from the noise and bustle. He gave them his sympathy, though that was not worth much; it was more, however, than it appeared the hon. and gallant Gentleman himself would be disposed to extend to them. Persons who came forward to represent that the public interests would be injuriously affected by railway enterprise were placed in a critical position by the practice of the House. Before a Private Bill Committee persons whose pecuniary interests were involved, who promoted or opposed a particular scheme, or were willing to spend money in defending particular rights, might all be represented. But those complaining on the part of the public had no means of making their voice heard in a committee-room. The matter was assuming a very grave character just then, when no less than twenty-one Bills affecting the metropolis were before the House. There seemed to be no reason why the railway should take Finsbury Circus, except that they would have to pay less for land there than for other land covered with houses. But if it were once laid down as a principle that railway companies were at liberty to turn open spaces into railway premises, Trafalgar Square, St. James's, and all the other public sites would be seized for those purposes. He was unable to point out to the deputation any way in which the interests of the public could be brought before the Committee; but he hoped that hon. Gentlemen who might hereafter be appointed to serve on that Committee would not consider themselves shut out from remembering what was for the public interests and the public convenience, although in strictness these might not be before them. He also suggested to the deputation that they ought to forward a petition to the House, setting forth their grievances, which would probably be referred to the Committee before which the Bill might be brought.

CAPTAIN JERVIS:—The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last branch of the question, with regard to the supervision exercised by his Department.

MR. COWPER:—I am unable to tell the hon. and gallant Member anything more than he knows himself. I am not aware of any powers which he is not aware of.

DANISH PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Why the Danish papers presented to the House on Friday last have not been delivered to hon. Members?

MR. LAYARD said, he was not able to answer the question, but he would make inquiry. The papers were printed, and so far as he was aware they had been sent from the Foreign Office.

THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

QUESTION.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to renew a Question he had put to the noble Lord at the head of the Government the other evening, which the noble Lord said he was not able to answer off-hand—a remarkable answer for him. Presuming that inquiry had since been made, he wished to know, Why it was that any despatches which might have been received from foreign Governments respecting the affairs of Greece had not been laid with the other papers on the table of the House?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—I think the Question put by my hon. and learned Friend, as I recollect it, was whether any despatch had been received from the Aus-

MR. ROEBUCK :—That was part of the Question.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON :—No such despatch has been received ; and no despatch has been received on that subject from any other Government.

PRINCE OF WALES—MESSAGE FROM HER MAJESTY.

Message from Her Majesty brought up, and read by Mr. Speaker (all the Members being uncovered), as follows :—

VICTORIA R.

Her Majesty relies on the liberality and affection of Her faithful Commons, and on the cordial interest which they have manifested in the happy event of the approaching Marriage of the Prince of Wales to the Princess Alexandra of Denmark, that they will be ready to concur in such provision as they may judge necessary to enable Her Majesty to settle an Establishment for the Prince and Princess suited to their rank and dignity.

V. R.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : Sir, the House have already been informed by the Speech from the Throne of the intended marriage of the Prince of Wales, and in their Address have expressed the sentiments which they entertain on that subject. All, therefore, that it becomes my duty to do on the present occasion is to ask the House to agree to an Address in answer to the Message which you, Sir, have just read, assuring Her Majesty that this House will at the earliest possible time take that Message into consideration, with a view of making such provision for his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and the Princess of Wales as may be suitable to their high rank and station. I am quite sure that the House will feel pleasure in adopting that course, and I therefore give notice that on Thursday, the earliest order day, it will be my duty to propose a Resolution on that subject. The House will, of course, understand that in agreeing to the Address which I am about to propose there is no pledge implied or expressed as to any particular arrangement. It would be unfitting for me now to go into those details which I shall have occasion to explain to the House on Thursday night. I shall therefore content my-

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to return to Her Majesty the Thanks of this House for Her most gracious Message, and to assure Her Majesty that this House will immediately proceed to the consideration thereof, in such a manner as shall demonstrate their zeal, duty, and affectionate attachment to Her Majesty, and a due regard to the rank and dignity of the Royal family.”

MR. DISRAELI : Sir, I am sure the House will agree to this Address with unanimity not only of the voice but of the heart. I am persuaded the House of Commons will seize every occasion of testifying its affectionate loyalty to the Sovereign under whose reign not only has the greatness of the Empire been sustained, but the happiness of the people has been increased. Nor can we ever forget, Sir, that from one, and that the most august, home in this country during the long period of a quarter of a century—a period commensurate with the reign itself—an undeviating influence has been exercised which has refined the taste and elevated the sentiments of the whole community. The country takes a deep interest in the happiness and in the order of the household of the Prince of Wales, and I am sure, Sir, the House will support every reasonable proposition brought forward by Her Majesty's Ministers, the object of which is to realize those results.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY : I quite concur in the Address, but I wish to know whether it is the intention of the Government to place on the table of the House any authentic account of the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall ? I am not aware that there is any Return which shows the amount of income for the past year and the accumulations during the minority of his Royal Highness. I think that such a document is necessary, and I ask for it now in order that the House may have the opportunity of considering it before entering upon this discussion.

MR. W. WILLIAMS : I think that before any Vote is come to on this subject we ought to have a full account of the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall, and also a statement of the accumulations during the minority of the Prince of Wales.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : The statement of the revenues

METROPOLITAN BUILDINGS—FINSBURY CIRCUS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he has received a deputation of the inhabitants of Finsbury Circus to solicit his support against the proposed extension of the Great Eastern Railway; if so, whether he has promised that support; and, in such a case, if he will state what supervision his Department possesses over projects of a similar nature within the metropolis?

MR. COWPER said, that a number of gentlemen who were in the habit of walking in Finsbury Circus, and who attached great importance to the preservation of the semi-rural character of that place, had done him the honour to call upon him, with the wish to enlist his sympathies with regard to the grievance which they anticipated was coming upon them. They stated that the Great Eastern Railway Company contemplated placing a station in the centre of Finsbury Circus, which had hitherto been a very quiet spot in the centre of the City of London. They added that it was almost the only place where persons who were obliged to reside in the City could live away from the noise and bustle. He gave them his sympathy, though that was not worth much; it was more, however, than it appeared the hon. and gallant Gentleman himself would be disposed to extend to them. Persons who came forward to represent that the public interests would be injuriously affected by railway enterprise were placed in a critical position by the practice of the House. Before a Private Bill Committee persons whose pecuniary interests were involved, who promoted or opposed a particular scheme, or were willing to spend money in defending particular rights, might all be represented. But those complaining on the part of the public had no means of making their voice heard in a committee-room. The matter was assuming a very grave character just then, when no less than twenty-one Bills affecting the metropolis were before the House. There seemed to be no reason why the railway should take Finsbury Circus, except that they would have to pay less for land there than for other land covered with houses. But if it were once laid down as a principle that railway companies were at liberty to turn open spaces into railway premises, Trafalgar Square, St. James's, and all the other public sites would be seized for those purposes. He was unable to point out to the deputation any way in which the interests of the public could be brought before the Committee; but he hoped that hon. Gentlemen who might hereafter be appointed to serve on that Committee would not consider themselves shut out from remembering what was for the public interests and the public convenience, although in strictness these might not be before them. He also suggested to the deputation that they ought to forward a petition to the House, setting forth their grievances, which would probably be referred to the Committee before which the Bill might be brought.

CAPTAIN JERVIS :—The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last branch of the question, with regard to the supervision exercised by his Department.

MR. COWPER :—I am unable to tell the hon. and gallant Member anything more than he knows himself. I am not aware of any powers which he is not aware of.

DANISH PAPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Why the Danish papers presented to the House on Friday last have not been delivered to hon. Members?

MR. LAYARD said, he was not able to answer the question, but he would make inquiry. The papers were printed, and so far as he was aware they had been sent from the Foreign Office.

THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

QUESTION.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to renew a Question he had put to the noble Lord at the head of the Government the other evening, which the noble Lord said he was not able to answer off-hand—a remarkable answer for him. Presuming that inquiry had since been made, he wished to know, Why it was that any despatches which might have been received from foreign Governments respecting the affairs of Greece had not been laid with the other papers on the table of the House?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON :—I think the Question put by my hon. and learned Friend, as I recollect it, was whether any despatch had been received from the Austrian Government on the subject of the cession of the Ionian Islands.

MR. ROEBUCK :—That was part of the Question.

PRINCE OF WALES—MESSAGE FROM HER MAJESTY.

VICTORIA R.

Her Majesty relies on the liberality and affection of Her faithful Commons, and on the cordial interest which they have manifested in the happy event of the approaching Marriage of the Prince of Wales to the Princess Alexandra of Denmark, that they will be ready to concur in such provision as they may judge necessary to enable Her Majesty to settle an Establishment for the Prince and Princess suited to their rank and dignity.

V. R.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : Sir, the House have already been informed by the Speech from the Throne of the intended marriage of the Prince of Wales, and in their Address have expressed the sentiments which they entertain on that subject. All, therefore, that it becomes my duty to do on the present occasion is to ask the House to agree to an Address in answer to the Message which you, Sir, have just read, assuring Her Majesty that this House will at the earliest possible time take that Message into consideration, with a view of making such provision for his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and the Princess of Wales as may be suitable to their high rank and station. I am quite sure that the House will feel pleasure in adopting that course, and I therefore give notice that on Thursday, the earliest order day, it will be my duty to propose a Resolution on that subject. The House will, of course, understand that in agreeing to the Address which I am about to propose there is no pledge implied or expressed as to any particular arrangement. It would be unfitting for me now to go into those details which I shall have occasion to explain to the House on Thursday night. I shall therefore content my-

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to return to Her Majesty the Thanks of this House for Her most gracious Message, and to assure Her Majesty that this House will immediately proceed to the consideration thereof, in such a manner as shall demonstrate their zeal, duty, and affectionate attachment to Her Majesty, and a due regard to the rank and dignity of the Royal family.”

MR. DISRAELI : Sir, I am sure the House will agree to this Address with unanimity not only of the voice but of the heart. I am persuaded the House of Commons will seize every occasion of testifying its affectionate loyalty to the Sovereign under whose reign not only has the greatness of the Empire been sustained, but the happiness of the people has been increased. Nor can we ever forget, Sir, that from one, and that the most august, home in this country during the long period of a quarter of a century—a period commensurate with the reign itself—an undeviating influence has been exercised which has refined the taste and elevated the sentiments of the whole community. The country takes a deep interest in the happiness and in the order of the household of the Prince of Wales, and I am sure, Sir, the House will support every reasonable proposition brought forward by Her Majesty's Ministers, the object of which is to realize those results.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY : I quite concur in the Address, but I wish to know whether it is the intention of the Government to place on the table of the House any authentic account of the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall ? I am not aware that there is any Return which shows the amount of income for the past year and the accumulations during the minority of his Royal Highness. I think that such a document is necessary, and I ask for it now in order that the House may have the opportunity of considering it before entering upon this discussion.

MR. W. WILLIAMS : I think that before any Vote is come to on this subject we ought to have a full account of the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall, and also a statement of the accumulations during the minority of the Prince of Wales.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : The statement of the revenues

of the Duchy of Cornwall will be laid on the table of the House this evening.

MR. W. WILLIAMS: Will it show the accumulations during the Prince's minority?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The statement is made in the form required by the Act of Parliament. [Several hon. MEMBERS: The accumulations?] The report from the Council of the Duchy would contain whatever further information was needed.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente.

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to return to Her Majesty the Thanks of this House for Her most gracious Message, and to assure Her Majesty that this House will immediately proceed to the consideration thereof, in such a manner as shall demonstrate their zeal, duty, and affectionate attachment to Her Majesty, and a due regard to the rank and dignity of the Royal Family.

Committee thereupon on Thursday.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Motion, That the House at rising do adjourn till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH ITALY.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the question of some late commercial treaties, and especially to the commercial treaty pending between this country and the Kingdom of Italy. He was aware that the opportunity which he had taken of bringing forward the subject of which he had given notice was somewhat unusual, but his sense of the importance and urgency of the question, induced him to avail himself of that method. He was afraid that the terms of his notice might disappoint, in some measure, those who thought he was about to address himself to a much larger question than that which he wished to bring under the attention of the House. But he had no desire to enter into the general question of the late commercial treaties. He had not the slightest intention to refer to the operation of the late French Treaty. On that matter he thought there were Members of the House who had something to unlearn; but he sincerely trusted that in the result the anticipations of the Government with respect to that treaty would be realized. The question he desired to raise was, however, one of importance. No one could deny the important part which commercial treaties had taken in the last few years, nor the great attention they had attracted from all concerned with our trade and manufactures. And, he would add, no body of men had shown themselves more sensible to the value of such treaties than Her Majesty's Government. At the time a commercial treaty was being negotiated between France and the Zollverein, Her Majesty's Government were most anxious to conclude a similar treaty. The treaty between France and the Zollverein, however, was broken off in consequence of opposition on the part of some of the minor German States, and thereupon Her Majesty's Government took no further steps in negotiating the treaty which they were before so anxious to conclude. Last year they entered into a commercial treaty with Belgium, and the tariff had since been more favourable to English interests. The noble Lord at the head of the Government had himself, during the recess, expressed at Southampton his conviction of the importance of negotiating a treaty of commerce between this country and Austria; and if he (Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald) was not mistaken, the noble Earl the Minister for Foreign Affairs, when in that House, had expressed a hope that from circumstances then occurring between this country and Spain considerable alterations might be made in the Spanish tariff in a sense favourable to British commerce and manufactures. There was, then, no question which more certainly occupied the attention of commercial men or attracted the anxiety of those concerned in the manufactures of the country than that of the conclusion of well-considered commercial treaties with other countries of Europe. But exactly in proportion as these commercial treaties were important and the desire existed for their extension, exactly in that proportion it became important to consider the principle on which Her Majesty's Government had acted in concluding these treaties. Her Majesty's Government had, in his opinion, proceeded upon a principle radically wrong; for their principle was to allow the French Government to take the initiative; and if they succeeded, then Her Majesty's Government bestirred themselves, but thought themselves very fortunate if they secured for the British merchant and manufacturer the same tariff which had been just established by France. Any principle more unfortunate could hardly be adopted, because it was clear that the tariff which might be highly advantageous

to the French merchant and manufacturer might be quite unsuitable to the circumstances of this country. For instance, France might say that she did not care what duty was levied upon half-manufactured products, provided a light duty was imposed upon her wines and silks; but, on the other hand, it would make a great difference to us whether our half-manufactured goods were heavily taxed or not, even though the foreign Government were willing to admit duty-free British wines and British silks. The matter had been illustrated in the case of the Belgian treaty. The tariff in that treaty was fixed between the French and the Belgian Governments. It had been found by the manufacturers of this country not only to be disadvantageous to them, but, if he was not mistaken, the adoption of this treaty, instead of placing the British merchant and manufacturer in a more favourable position than before, actually made it worse, inasmuch as increased duties were now charged upon some of their productions. The first complaint he had, then, to make was that Her Majesty's Government had not been sufficiently active in taking the initiative in the negotiation of these commercial treaties with foreign Powers. At the present moment the French Government were doing all they could to negotiate a commercial treaty with Austria. Austria was most anxious to reform her tariff, and nothing could be easier than for Her Majesty's Government to form a treaty with that Power to the great advantage of our manufacturers. The initiative, however, was left with France. A more forcible instance of the imperfect manner in which the Foreign Department performed its duties in this respect could not be adduced than what was passing at that time, when a treaty was pending between this country and Italy. In the course of the last year Signor Marliani, a distinguished member of the Italian Government, and Minister of Commerce, came over here with the intention of negotiating a commercial treaty between Italy and this country, and although he was here for a considerable length of time, it did not appear to have struck the Foreign Office as of the least importance to put the Italian Minister of Commerce into communication with the Board of Trade. The result, he had heard, was that the gentleman returned home without having had any communication with his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Milner Gibson). Such was the information he had received. But some time afterwards the Foreign Office put itself into communication with the Board of Trade upon the subject, and the Board of Trade sent to the various chambers of commerce throughout the country, stating that a treaty with Italy was pending, and requesting information as to the various productions of the districts to which they belonged, and as to the principles upon which they might think it advisable that the tariff to be adopted should be framed. The result was, a vast amount of information was obtained, and the greatest pains were taken to furnish the Board of Trade with all the necessary details. He was bound to say that the Board of Trade availed themselves of the information, and the chambers of commerce were soon after apprised that the details which they had furnished had been so far considered that the tariff to be appended to the treaty had been draughted. That draught was submitted to the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, and in consequence of the exertions of the President of the Board of Trade a perfect commercial treaty with Italy became the subject of consideration. So the matter stood for some time; but at length certain chambers of commerce heard that a commercial treaty with the Kingdom of Italy was on the point of being signed, that it was in no respect founded upon the information which had been obtained by the Board of Trade, and that the treaty, which, however, was not signed, contained a tariff identical with that which had been adopted in the treaty between France and Italy. That circumstance, as might easily be conceived, created great astonishment and regret among those who had an interest in the question and had been consulted, and the consequence was that many of them had thought it their duty to make representations upon the subject to the President of the Board of Trade. This question also was asked, "If we are to have the French tariff, pray inform us what that tariff is." Let the House understand whether or not Her Majesty's Government had finally assented to a treaty embodying the French treaty, the tariff of which they had never seen, and of the provisions of which they were ignorant, having only reason to believe that they were similar to those adopted in the Franco-Belgian treaty. This appeared an exemplification of the objection which he took in the first instance to the course followed by the Government—namely, that of allowing the French Government to precede them, and afterwards being content to take the various stipulations of the French treaty, and make them applicable, as far as they could, to England. He knew he should be met with the answer that the reason that was done was because England was not in a position to offer any concessions to other Powers, as she had already given up everything; but it appeared to him that that answer came with a bad grace from those who had given up everything; and, moreover, he did not think it a well-founded answer. They were told that the moral influence of this country swayed the councils of Europe; but if that moral influence were of such great weight in political matters, he was sure, if those who represented the British Government were in their communications with foreign Powers to cultivate the most friendly relations, and were not to write in epigrammatic style, conveying great offence, though the words used might of themselves seem innocent enough, and if they were to prove themselves earnest and eager for the promotion of close commercial intercourse with all foreign nations—he was sure, he repeated, that the moral influence which was of such advantage in political matters would in commercial matters also secure great advantages to the manufacturing and trading classes of this country. He believed that there was no more important function which the Ambassadors of this country or the diplomatic service generally could perform than by making use of the great ability which had always distinguished that service in negotiating commercial treaties; and it would be of far more importance to the country that they should devote themselves to that object rather than to writing such despatches as he had glanced at, so irritating to official persons abroad, and so disappointing to those who read them at home. In confirmation of these observations he would refer to two most important countries with which it was their interest to maintain the most friendly relations. Russia, for example. Why, it was only within the last few weeks the British public were made aware of a correspondence which had taken place between the head of the Foreign Office and one of the chief ministers of Russia, and of the despatches of the noble Earl—despatches conveying, under cover of the most insinuating language, the most insulting and pointed sarcasms against the policy adopted by Russia. Take again their position in regard to Brazil. They might have effected arrangements by which an extensive and advantageous commerce could be carried on with Brazil. How had the Government acted lately in regard to that power? If it were considered important at that moment to effect a treaty with that country, how could they have the face to make the application, or in what way would their overtures be met? He put those questions before the Government because he was confident that the people were alive to the importance of commercial treaties, and would never be content to follow subserviently the footsteps of France in regard to commercial policy. Whilst respecting the rights of France and of all other Powers, towards whom they wished to preserve a friendly spirit, they expected the Government to maintain a bold and an independent policy—to uphold their own tariff while seeking to extend the policy involved as widely as possible. He believed that if that line of conduct were pursued, then the present Government, or any future Government, in obtaining commercial treaties, would confer lasting and enormous benefits on this country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the subject brought forward by the hon. Gentleman was one of great importance and interest to the manufacturing classes of this country; and he was sure he was expressing the feelings of the community which he represented when he thanked the hon. Gentleman for the sentiments to which he had given utterance, especially in connection with the treaty said to be pending between Italy and this country. It was utterly impossible for people interested in manufactures to know their exact position at the present moment in reference to that matter. The statement made by the hon. Gentleman was substantially correct, and the House would not be surprised at the ignorance to which he had referred when he mentioned to them a few facts. In the early part of last year the different chambers of commerce in the north of England and the midland counties, warned by experience of the difficulty of obtaining a treaty of Belgium, waited upon the authorities of the Foreign Office and stated their wish that an intercourse should be kept up between the Government offices and the chambers of commerce in order the better to serve the interests of England in the framing of treaties. Well, the deputations were received in the most frank and agreeable manner by the Foreign Office. They were delighted to find that negotiations were then going on for a treaty with Italy. A circular announcing that fact was issued by the Government authorities last February. The Bradford Chamber of Commerce, among others, replied to that circular, commenting upon that treaty, and showed how it could be improved. A copy of that reply was sent to the Foreign Office and to the Board of Trade; but for a considerable period subsequently they heard not one syllable on the subject of the projected treaty with Italy. Having heard that Signor Marliani had been sent from Turin to England for the purpose of getting as well as giving information as to how the trade between the two countries could be increased, he (Mr. Forster) went to the Foreign Office with the view of putting him into communication with the gentlemen representing the commercial interests of the north of England. By the Foreign Office, however, he was referred to the Board of Trade; and when he went to the Board of Trade, he was referred back to the Foreign Office. He did not know if Signor Marliani was treated in the same way; but if he was, he could say with confidence that the Italian minister must have left this country just as ignorant as he was when he entered into it, as far as the information he had sought for was concerned. Believing, from the long silence maintained by the Government Departments on the subject of this treaty, that the negotiations had fallen to the ground, it was not surprising his constituents were thunderstruck with the information conveyed to them by the newspapers that a commercial treaty with Italy was now on the point of being signed, and they concluded that one of two things must have happened—either that the Government during the present or the last year had been conducting their negotiations with Italy without obtaining information from those most able to give it, or that they had thought it enough simply to get for this country the treaty which France had obtained for herself. That, however, would not be enough. True, the Italian Government would not be dealing fairly towards us if it put France in a better position than England; and, on the other hand, we could scarcely expect to obtain advantages which had been denied to France. But it was quite possible that a treaty framed by French Ministers would not serve English interests, and that the concessions which suited France might not be of much value to England. He hoped, therefore, to learn from his hon. Friend that Her Majesty's Government had not been remiss in this respect, and that our negotiations had been keeping pace with those conducted by our ally. Before sitting down he felt bound to say that the commercial interests of this country were injured by the want of proper arrangements between the Foreign Office and the Board of Trade. The theory, he understood, was that when the Foreign Office required commercial information, it was to apply to the Board of Trade; but then the former might be so ignorant as not to know when it ought to ask for information. There was a popular notion on the Continent that the end and aim of British policy was to promote trade; but, in reality, that was one of those things which they managed better in France. There the Foreign Office contained a department of trade, and the Ministry of Commerce had a department for foreign affairs. In our own case some arrangement should be made by which the information collected by the Board of Trade in regard to our commercial relations with other nations should be systematically submitted to the Foreign Office. As far as his hon. Friend the Under Secretary was personally concerned, he had done all in his power to meet the wishes of the manufacturers; but unfortunately free trade was not one of the traditions of the Foreign Office. The French treaty did not originate there, and the Department did not seem to be aware of the effect which it was producing on the Continent. Some of the people in this country were presumptuous enough to think that the experience of the noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office, although it was advantageous in many other respects, was disadvantageous on this subject. That experience was gained when the idea of free trade had not taken possession of this country, and when the notion that free trade principles would in time regulate the commercial dealings between this country and Continental States was regarded as a utopian dream. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary might rest assured that by upholding the principles of commercial freedom he was furthering the cause of political freedom more effectually than by offering to other Powers gratuitous advice, on matter how appropriate or vigorously expressed. The noble Lord at the head of the Government also ought to be aware that it did not become him, as the protector of British interests, to hand over to France the direction of that free-trade movement which was originated by England, or to follow with faltering footsteps the movements of France or of any foreign Government whatever.

Mr. LAYARD said, he was rather surprised to hear the complaints which had fallen from the hon. Gentleman opposite, but he was disposed to consider the course taken by the hon. Gentleman as being due to his being so recent a convert to the cause of free trade, and, like all new converts, to his exhibiting greater zeal than discretion. He believed he should be able to remove the grounds of the hon. Gentleman's objections. But first he wished to correct an error into which the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had fallen in asserting that the Foreign Office had nothing to do with the French treaty. The Foreign Office took up the matter warmly, doing all that depended upon it to promote the conclusion of the treaty, and the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) had himself acknowledged the hearty and valuable co-operation he received from Earl Cowley, who was joined with him in the negotiations on the subject. When the hon. Member for Rochdale was sent to Paris on that mission, he naturally asked the British Government before going what he was authorized to offer the French Government. If he had gone to Paris with his hands empty, it was not probable that he would have succeeded in obtaining the concessions which the French Government ultimately made to us. Fortunately, however, the hon. Gentleman had much to offer. There were heavy duties on wine and other articles of French produce and on articles of luxury, and even to a certain extent of necessity. In consideration of a reduction in those duties the French Government consented to the various changes in their tariff which had proved very beneficial not only to this country but to France herself. It was necessary to bear in mind that in our domestic legislation we differed from France. We at once gave the whole world the benefit of the concessions which had been made to our ally. France, on the other hand, withheld from others the privileges she had conceded to us, and thus retained in her hands the means of bargaining with other Powers for mutual commercial concessions. When one nation sought any concession from another nation, there were various grounds on which the request might be based. An appeal might be made to the generosity of the other Power, but it was doubtful whether that would have much effect, as Governments are influenced by motives of interest rather than generosity; or an appeal might be made to a treaty which gave the applicant the privileges of the most favoured nation; or, as a friendly State, claims might be put forward to privileges which had been granted to another State. If we had only the latter ground to rely upon, it was above all things desirable, that as we had no concessions to offer in return for the advantages sought, some other Power, which possessed the means of bargaining, should commence the negotiations. That was the reason why France had been allowed to precede us in the instance of the Italian and other treaties. Every concession which was made to her gave us a certain right to claim the same from Powers with which we were in friendly relations. On the other hand, other Governments naturally replied, when we asked them to change their tariff, "If we concede this reduction to you for no equivalent, we shall be expected to treat France and other nations in the same way, and be unable to obtain concessions in return. Although you may have nothing to give us in exchange, France has." If we had taken the initiative, the Italian Government would very naturally have said, "You have nothing to give us in exchange for what we give you; and if we freely concede your demands, we shall be placed in a bad position in making terms with France, with whom we are on the most friendly terms." So far from Her Majesty's Government not having endeavoured to make treaties of commerce with other nations, the fact was that there was scarcely a Power in Europe with whom negotiations had not been opened during the last year or two. Treaties had been concluded with Turkey and Belgium. The treaty with the former was a very important one. The Turkish Government, always adopting a very liberal policy in its commercial relations with other nations, has reduced its export duties to the very lowest scale, and has placed the import duties on a much more favourable footing than they had ever been before. The remarks he had just made applied with peculiar force to the case of the Belgian Treaty. The Belgian Government were asked to make a treaty of commerce with us, as they had done with France, and it was pointed out to them that it would be an unfriendly act, having entered into a treaty with France, to refuse to negotiate one with England. They replied by asking what we could give to them in return, and they suggested that if they gave to us what they had given to France, we should consent to capitalize the Scheldt dues. Now, the capitalization of the Scheldt dues had nothing whatever to do with a treaty of commerce, and our Government at once refused to admit the principle of purchasing a treaty. Again and again we insisted upon the unfriendliness of refusing to us what had been given to France. Eventually that argument, and none other, prevailed, and in the end the Belgian Government made a treaty of commerce with us, abandoning their demand for the capitalization of the Scheldt dues, which formed the subject of a separate negotiation. The hon. Member for Hoveham (Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald) had been entirely misinformed with respect to the Italian Treaty. Last year the French Government, desiring to place their commercial relations with Italy upon a better footing, proposed a treaty of commerce with that country. The British and Italian Governments were equally desirous that a treaty should be negotiated between Italy and this country. The Italian Government accordingly sent an agent to England, Signor Marliani, who, though a distinguished Senator, was not a member of the Government, to negotiate such a treaty. It was not true, as had been stated, that Signor Marliani had no communication with the Board of Trade or the Foreign Office. On the contrary, he had interviews with his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, while he (Mr. Layard) introduced him to some of our leading commercial men, and furnished him with all the information he required. What, however, was his invariable language when he was requested to discuss the terms of the treaty? He always said that he could not negotiate a treaty with England until he knew what had been done in Paris, because, he argued, if Italy gave us concessions for which we could give her nothing in return, France, as a friendly Power, would insist upon the same advantages without Italy obtaining the equivalent which she was then trying to procure from the French Government.

The negotiations in Paris were not brought to a conclusion last year; and when the recent Ministerial crisis took place in Turin, Signor Marliani was recalled to Italy. The hon. Member for Bradford had stated that the Government had appealed to the chambers of commerce, but had not acted upon their reports or advice. That was true; and the chambers gave them valuable information; but then that information was of no avail under the circumstances, because the Government could do nothing with it till the completion of the treaty between Italy and France, which had just taken place. His hon. Friend opposite expressed surprise at the Government not being yet in possession of the Franco-Italian treaty and tariff; but the treaty had not yet been ratified, and until its ratification it could not be published. His hon. Friend the Member for Bradford might depend on this—that before any treaty should be made with the Italian Government the tariff would be referred to the various chambers of commerce throughout the country, and that the Government would be well pleased to receive reports from them on the subject. While on the subject of Italy, he could assure the House that the Government were fully alive to the great importance of increasing our trade with Italy. Italian trade was growing every day, promoted by liberty and unity, and encouraged by the spirit of enterprise which had recently sprung up in Italy—a proof of which he had just presented to the House in the shape of a report from our Consul General of Naples. During the recess the hon. and learned Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) made, through the newspapers, certain assertions relative to Neapolitan trade which filled him with amazement, and induced the Foreign Office to write to the Consul General at Naples for an explanation. The explanation thus obtained was so important, and so completely refuted the statements of the hon. and learned Member, that he hoped the House would permit him to give a few facts from it. The number of British steamers to Naples had increased between 1859, the last year of the Bourbons, and the end of 1862, from 66 to 119; and the tonnage from 41,675 to 95,292. In regard to sailing vessels, the increase in the same period was from 23,905 tons to 39,678, so that there had been a total increase in tonnage from 65,580 in 1859—the last year of the Bourbons—to 134,970 in 1862. These were authentic documents. [Mr. HENNESSY: Up to what time?] Up to the end of last year. In foreign vessels there was the same enormous increase. The steamers at Naples, from 1859 to 1862, had increased in number from 656 to 1,303, and in tonnage from 192,378 to 442,832. At Gallipoli—the next port in importance to that of Naples—there was an increase during the same period in British ships from 43 to 84, and from 235 to 324 in the ships of other nations, and the increase was equally observable in the estimated value of the cargoes shipped from Gallipoli, the total amount in 1859 being £272,591, and in 1862 £762,432. The number of ships at that port belonging to Great Britain in 1859 represented 4,373 tons, and in 1862 10,504 tons; the estimated value being in 1859 £192,184, and in 1862 £441,472. The increase of the actual trade from Naples during the same period was from £476,821 to £850,708. With regard to Tuscany, the returns of the Board of Trade showed an equally satisfactory result. The trade from Tuscany to Great Britain had increased during the same period from £807,000 to £1,062,081; the colonial trade from £903,061 in 1859 to £1,265,000 in 1862. These figures would, he thought, be regarded as a most complete answer to the assertions of the hon. and learned Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) as to the falling-off in the trade of Italy since the union. But, to return to the subject of our negotiations with foreign countries with respect to commercial treaties, the House was aware that last year the French Government were negotiating a treaty with Prussia and the Zollverein. As soon as that fact became known, the British Government applied to Prussia and the Zollverein to make with them a similar treaty of commerce. The reply, as might have been expected, was precisely the same we had received from Belgium—that negotiations could not be entered into with us until those in progress with France were concluded. "France," it was said in effect, "can give us an equivalent. You can give us none. When we have ascertained what France will give us, we shall be ready to give to you, as a friendly nation, what we have given to France." Our Government told them that though their tariff might be acceptable to France, it might not be so to us. It had been said that a reference should have been made to the Board of Trade. What our Government really did was this—they accepted the offer of Prussia on the part of the Zollverein to make with us a treaty as favourable as that made with France; but they said that the question was a question of tariff, and that the question of tariff should be discussed before the treaty was negotiated. Prussia consented, and our Government sent to Berlin Mr. Mallett, who had accompanied the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) to Paris, a most distinguished officer of the Board of Trade, to communicate with the Prussian Government as to the modifications of the French tariff which England would require. Unfortunately, for various reasons, political and others, up to that moment the treaty between the Zollverein and France had not been concluded. The Prussian Government had consented to the treaty, but four of the Southern States of the Zollverein, for political reasons, had refused to do so. Unanimity in the Zollverein was required to enable them to negotiate a treaty, and until that unanimity had been secured, and the treaty with France had been ratified, Prussia could not negotiate with this country. The Zollverein would cease in 1866, and it would then be seen whether it would be renewed on its former basis. That was a matter on which he (Mr. Layard) could not venture to offer an opinion. As regards Austria, it was quite true that at the beginning of last year we heard that the Austrian Government were disposed to make liberal commercial concessions to this country; and we at once proposed a basis. But we were told, however well-disposed the Ministers of the Emperor of Austria were to a liberal commercial policy with this country, it was impossible for the present to negotiate a treaty. There were political as well as social difficulties in the way; the Zollverein, in which she wished to enter, might be broken up, and until this question was settled she could conclude no treaty with us. It was from no want of zeal or willingness on the part of the British Government that no treaty of commerce with Austria had been concluded. It had been asked why had not England insisted on the privileges of what was called the "Intermediate Treaty" being given to England. Now, what was the nature of that Intermediate Treaty? By special arrangement between Austria and the Zollverein States goods which crossed the continuous frontier of Austria and the Zollverein were subject to a different tariff to those which were imported into Austria or the Zollverein by any other route. Supposing, for instance, Prussia sent goods into Austria across the frontier line which divides Austria from Bavaria, she paid one tariff; but if she sent them round by Gibraltar to Trieste, she paid another and a much higher tariff. That, however, was the result of mutual arrangement founded upon political and other motives, and there was no chance of any other Power obtaining the same privileges. The principles of free trade had not penetrated sufficiently into Europe to produce such a result. It was to be hoped that the time would come when States would recognise the advantage of doing away with such differential tariffs. Then as to Denmark, the British Government had every reason to believe that there was a party in Denmark, political as well as commercial, disposed to enter into a liberal treaty of commerce with this country. The Government lost no time in proposing to the Danish Government to enter into such treaty. But what was the first question with which they were greeted? "What can you give us in return?" The reply of the English Government was that Danish manufactures were admitted into England without duty, and her ships treated as our own ships. So nothing was done. But suppose the Danish Government were to enter into a negotiation with another Power on a liberal basis, we should have a right to come forward and say, "You have treated that Government in a liberal spirit, and we, as a friendly Power, have a right to ask for the same treatment." That argument, no doubt, would have its due weight. The same thing occurred with regard to Spain and Portugal. What they wished for from us was a reduction of the duty on thin wines, and that they had obtained without a treaty of commerce with us—the French treaty gave them that. When the British Government offered them a treaty of commerce, the reply was, as in other cases, "What are you going to give us in return?" At the present moment it was hopeless to expect from either Spain or Portugal any treaty of commerce on a liberal basis. His hon. Friend the Member for Bradford had made some remarks with regard to the advantage which would be derived from a more immediate connection between the Foreign Office and the Board of Trade, and suggested that a commercial department should be instituted at the Foreign Office, and that it should be placed in direct communication with the Board of Trade. His hon. Friend, he was sure, would say this, that the Foreign Office, whilst he (Mr. Layard) had been in it, had ever afforded him all the information in commercial matters that he could reasonably have expected from it. The proposition of a special department of trade at the Foreign Office had been fully considered by him, and he had arrived at the conclusion that the adoption of that plan would not work well, and would besides interfere to some extent with the proper functions of the Board of Trade, and a double set of officers would have to be employed, and an additional expense would be cast upon the country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: What I suggested was, that the officers at the Foreign Office should be placed in direct and constant communication with the Board of Trade.

MR. LAYARD said, the Foreign Office was in constant communication with the Board of Trade, and acted on the opinion of the Board of Trade on commercial matters, just as the Home Office was referred to in matters coming within its immediate cognizance. He believed he had said enough to show that the complaints of the hon. Member opposite were not well founded, and he could assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government were anxious, and had been anxious, to do all in their power to enter into commercial treaties with other Powers upon a liberal footing, and he thought the last charge that could be brought against the Government was that they were not fully alive to the great importance to this country of its vast commercial interests.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that some time ago he had ventured to make some remarks in that House which he thought he might with propriety repeat on that occasion; they conveyed a question and a request. The question was, whether the terms of the French treaty were not such as to abolish the duties upon the articles enumerated—upon the commodities enumerated—under Article 5 of that treaty, in favour of all nations, not in favour of the produce of France and Algeria only? That question he raised in 1860; and although the Lord Chancellor, who was then Attorney General, stated that the operation of that article was in favour only of the produce of France and Algeria, he (Mr. Newdegate) stated that such opinions were controverted; and he now asked the Government to inform the House, whether the interpretation of the treaty then given by the Attorney General was found to be correct, when tested by the negotiations which had been carried on with other countries subsequent to the conclusion of the treaty with France. Now, all that the hon. Gentleman who represented the Foreign Office had stated tended directly to the conclusion that the duties abolished on the commodities enumerated under the 5th article of the treaty with France, were abolished by the operation of that treaty on commodities imported from all the other countries of the world. He would ask the Government to bring the question to a practical test. Let them lay before the House the text of the Belgian treaty, so that hon. Members could compare the provisions of that treaty with the provisions of the French treaty, and see whether the danger which he anticipated in 1860 was, or was not, brought upon this country by the operation of the French treaty. He ventured in 1860 to say that those who negotiated that treaty had placed the Emperor of the French in the position of being the representative of all mankind; and he asked whether the repeated answers received by the British Government, when they attempted to negotiate with other countries, did not show this, that the operation of the French treaty had placed France in this position, that her action governed the action of all other foreign countries with respect to the commerce of England? He was a very humble Member of that House; but if any hon. Member would turn to Hansard, he would see, that supported as he was by the legal opinions of learned Members who sat near him, over and over again in 1860 he urged upon that House, "You are making over to the Government of France the decision of other foreign countries, when you apply to them, or shall apply to them hereafter, for any commercial treaty." It was a grave subject; and he trusted that the Government would, by laying on the table of the House the text of the Belgian treaty, and, by the information at their command, enable the House to judge whether this country was not placed in the position of being bound to follow in the footsteps of France when France was negotiating foreign treaties, owing to this country having nothing to give in exchange, and having rendered herself a suppliant for the same favours as were given to France, who had retained the power of giving something in exchange.

Mr. Newdegate

Look at what had been stated by the last speaker. We went to Belgium, and they said, "What can you give us in exchange?" Our answer was, "We have nothing to give." And in a commercial sense that was true; then followed a demand for a political concession. Why we could not negotiate at all, except by making some political concession in return for commercial stipulations. The hon. Member for Bradford was inclined to blame the Foreign Office; but, according to papers laid before them in 1860, Earl Cowley represented to the Government at home that such was the rapidity of the operations of the hon. Member for Rochdale, then at Paris, that the noble Earl was totally unable to follow them, and he could not therefore be responsible for them. Therefore, it was unjust to blame the Foreign Office for the acts of an independent negotiator, who completely outstripped our ambassador. If any one deserved credit for the French treaty, it was the hon. Member for Rochdale; and, on the other hand, if they were bound hand and foot by that treaty, and were therefore incapable of negotiating other treaties, it was the hon. Member for Rochdale who ought to be held responsible.

MR. HENNESSY said, his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State had referred to a subject upon which he had employed himself a little during the recess; but he must appeal from his hon. Friend to the Cabinet Minister who sat close beside him. His hon. Friend stated that the Consul General at Naples had given a return of the trade between England and Naples, from which it appeared that our trade with the Neapolitan provinces since their annexation had been most flourishing. What, however, if the Board of Trade told a totally opposite story? He had in his hand the last Return presented by the Board of Trade, that for the eleven months ending December, 1862, containing the most complete information which it was possible to obtain on the subject; and in every page in which the words "Naples and Sicily" occurred the House would observe a decline in the trade. Page 9, embracing the eleven months ending November, 1862, gave an account of the imports of wine into this country from Naples and Sicily. The figures showed that the value of those imports was £197,000 in 1861, and £183,000 in 1862. Page 13 also indicated a similar falling-off in the wine trade—namely, from £66,000 in 1861 to £38,000 in 1862. Page 25 referred to our linen trade with Naples and Sicily, and it showed that the amount in money value of our linen which they took in 1861 was £66,000, and in 1862 it was only £51,000. The quantity of linen yarn had also fallen off. It should be observed that he was now quoting from every single page in which Naples and Sicily were mentioned. Coming to the iron trade with those provinces, it amounted in 1861 to £88,000, and in 1862 to but £79,000. In the woollen trade a falling-off was likewise exhibited, from £207,000 in 1861 to £161,000 in 1862. Those figures exhausted all the articles specified in the Board of Trade Returns, and pointed out that in all of them there was a decrease. In opposition to the authority of those Returns his hon. Friend had asserted that there was a general increase in our trade, although he had not entered into any details, or told them what was the increase in each particular article. His hon. Friend had also alluded to our maritime intercourse with Naples and Sicily. It was a matter of little importance how many British ships sailed into or out of Naples and Sicily, or how many Neapolitan vessels came to this country; but even in reference to the statistics of shipping there was a difference between the Under Secretary and the Board of Trade. At page 36 of the Returns four tables were given with respect to shipping. From the first of them it appeared that the number of foreign vessels which had entered the ports of the United Kingdom coming from Sicily had declined since 1860 from 141 to 139. The vessels that had cleared had, of course, also declined, the number in 1861 being 187, and 140 in 1862. But the table to which he called particular attention appeared at page 37, where again he found a decline. It gave an account of the number and tonnage of the vessels entered inwards and cleared outwards from various countries during the ten months ending the 31st of October, 1862. Unfortunately, they did not include the whole year, but there was a falling-off in each case, except in the fourth table, where alone there was a slight increase. What was the moral to be drawn from these facts? The Board of Trade Returns contradicted the Foreign Office, and might be fairly taken as correct. Indeed, where the officials of the Foreign Office were in error, or in want of information on matters of trade and commerce, they were bound to be guided by the statistics of the Board of Trade. But that was not all. His hon. Friend had not adverted to an important report on the trade and commerce of Italy and the state of Italian finance received by Earl Russell from Mr. West, the Secretary of the Legation at Turin. Our Consul General at Naples was contradicted, not only by our own Board of Trade, but also by the Secretary of our Legation at Turin. That gentleman informed Her Majesty's Government that there was a steady decline in most branches of British commerce with Italy, and that that decline was owing, as might naturally be expected, to this fact, that the taxes of Piedmont were so heavy, her customs duties so cumbrous, for the purpose of keeping up a large army, as to discourage trade. As an illustration of this, Mr. West stated that the occupation of Southern Italy by Piedmontese troops was so expensive that, to use his own words, "it will swallow up the total revenues from all the rest of the annexed provinces put together." Yet they found an organ of the Foreign Office not quoting that report, but quoting a statement not before Parliament from our Consul General at Naples, who was not appointed to his present office without the express sanction and approval of the Piedmontese Government. And that marked the distinction. The Secretary of our Legation at Turin was perfectly independent of the Piedmontese Government, and his statements, like those of the Board of Trade, might be regarded as reliable. Again, what was notoriously the present financial condition of Sardinia? Why, she was now demanding a loan of, he thought, 700,000,000*f*. Last year the Piedmontese Finance Minister found that he had a deficit of £17,000,000; and how, he should like to know, could it be expected that the Government of which he was a Member would, under these circumstances, lower the customs duties and meet this country in the free-trade spirit of which so much had that evening been said? The hon. Member for Bradford, addressing his constituents on the subject during the recess, had, if he was not mistaken, told them that our trade with Tuscany, or at all events that portion of it with which they were most intimately concerned, had declined since her annexation to Piedmont had taken place.

tion, but I did not state that the trade had diminished. To do so would be to state that which I do not believe.

MR. HENNESSY said, he could show the hon. Member that our trade with Tuscany had also declined, as was natural should be the case if the tariff had been largely increased. He found that in 1861, for instance—he quoted from the second last Returns, because the last did not give the required class of facts—while our trade with Tuscany had for three-quarters of the year amounted to £844,000, it had in the corresponding three-quarters of 1862 fallen off to £771,000. Yet, notwithstanding those figures, the hon. Member for Bradford seemed still to be under the impression that that trade had not undergone a decrease. It was not, however, by the Board of Trade alone that evidence of the error under which the hon. Member laboured on the subject was furnished. Earl Russell had sent two gentlemen to institute inquiries on the very question through Sir James Hudson, and there had been a despatch to the noble Lord from our Consul in Tuscany, written early last Session, which went to confirm the view which he (Mr. Hennessy) was endeavouring to lay before the House. He might add that he had been at Leghorn at the close of 1860, when a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, attended by a great number of British merchants, was held; and upon that occasion a memorial had been forwarded to the Piedmontese Government to the effect that the trade of Leghorn would be destroyed if the Piedmontese tariff were applied to Tuscany. But not only were the duties now higher than those which existed before the annexation, but the Piedmontese system of taxation was antiquated and cumbrous in the extreme. In Tuscany, previous to the annexation, an ad valorem scale of duty prevailed, whereas now it was specific. Last year, with some difficulty, he obtained from Earl Russell a despatch from our Consul at Tuscany on this subject, and it explained the operation of the new tariff on the Bradford trade. It would appear that the trade of Bradford with Tuscany consisted for the most part of a kind of woollen mixed with silk, which commodity, under the old tariff, paid a very slight duty, but which, under the present, being placed in the category of silk, was subjected to so high a charge that he believed the trade in it was extinct. The reason, therefore, was clear why the policy which the hon. Member supported had caused his constituents to suffer. He would simply say, in conclusion, that it was disgraceful to see such a difference prevail between two public Departments as that which seemed to exist between the Foreign Office and the Board of Trade in the case under discussion, the representative of the one Department denying that decline of trade the reality of which his Colleague, a Cabinet Minister, sitting by him, had supplied the means of establishing.

MR. SOMERSET BEAUMONT said, it was by no means to be wondered at that after the occurrence of great political changes the financial and commercial results were not precisely the same as those which previously obtained; nor did the statistics quoted by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down at all convince him of the fact he was so anxious to prove—that the present condition of Italy was worse than it had been before the annexation took place. He could not at all concur with the hon. Gentleman by whom the subject under discussion had been introduced in the various criticisms which he had made on the conduct of the Government in reference to commercial treaties. He found, for instance, that since they came into office they had negotiated treaties with France, Turkey, and Belgium, while the Prime Minister himself had spontaneously, at a meeting in a large commercial town which he had visited during the recess, urged the immense advantage which it would be to this country to have a commercial treaty with Austria. The community, however, to whom the speech was addressed, instead of sending a Member to support the noble Lord, elected one on the question of the narrow or the broad gauge. He might observe that he had not long ago taken part in the proceedings of a chamber of commerce in which the treaty with Belgium was discussed, and that he had not heard a single fault found with its provisions; while, so far as the objection that our Government had never begun negotiations for treaties until France had set the example was concerned, he could only say that it was refuted by the fact that we had made a treaty with Turkey without waiting for any such incentive to action. It must also be borne in mind, in dealing with this question, that foreign countries were not so much frightened at entering into competition with the manufacturers of France as they were with those of England. He should be more disposed to agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite if it could be shown that the Government had been remiss in the promotion of commercial relations between this country and Austria. That was a subject of very great importance, and one which he had brought before his constituents recently. The hon. Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had, however, stated, what he believed to be perfectly accurate, that Austria was not at present free to consider a commercial treaty with this country. The answer given by the noble Lord at the head of the Government last Session, when he (Mr. S. Beaumont) put a question on the subject, was that till the relations between Austria and the Zollverein were settled we could not expect to get a treaty with Austria. He did not believe that her Majesty's Government could be blamed for not having succeeded in bringing about commercial relations with Austria. That country presented an excellent field for commercial intercourse. There was growing up there, under the exercise of free discussion and liberal institutions, a desire for free trade. They had the assurance of the noble Lord at the head of the Government that the Austrian Ministry were alive to the value of free trade, and he felt confident that at the proper time the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary would show that the Government was not open to the imputation of being dilatory in these matters, and would be able to add another commercial treaty to those which had recently been contracted.

MR. LIDDELL said, he thought that the commercial community were greatly indebted to his hon. Friend for calling attention to that important subject. He felt that there could be nothing more unsatisfactory than what had fallen from the lips of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He always believed that free trade never could be conducted by one man or by one nation—it required two or more as parties to the arrangement; and it appeared that in consequence of having given up what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had once called the rags and tatters of protection, of which he at the time thought a better use might have been made, we were now in a position of having no inducements to offer to other States, for greater commercial freedom, and our prospects as to treating with them were absolutely hopeless. He understood that such was the case with regard to Spain and Portugal, for which countries we had made unexampled sacrifices, but the tariffs of which in respect to our ships and to some classes of goods were more restrictive and oppressive than those of any other countries. Austria, we were told, could not, on account of its peculiar position in reference to other German Powers, enter into a commercial treaty with this country; and yet, as had been shown by the hon. Member who had just sat down, in a most able and valuable pamphlet, there existed in that empire a most extensive and most valuable field for our commerce. All that was now left for us to do was to lose no opportunity of laying before those States, our commercial relations with which we wished to extend, the successful results which had attended our own adoption of free-trade principles and practice. He was afraid that our Foreign Office was not sufficiently active in that respect, but he hoped that in future no such opportunities would be neglected.

MR. LEVESON GOWER said, he felt bound to protest against any language which would imply that by the reduction of customs duties this country had sacrificed anything whatever. It had been stated by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs that there were only two ways of approaching foreign Governments on the subject of treaties of commerce, one of which consisted in having something to offer, the other method being to leave matters to their generosity. But both these plans were perfectly useless in our case, because we had nothing more to offer, and in the tone of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down he fancied he detected something like a tone of regret that we had not something like a rag of protection left for the purpose. In any such feeling he could not participate, because he believed that our national prosperity was in a great measure due to our commerce being free and uncrippled by any such restrictions. It was useless to appeal to the generosity of other nations, because he did not believe that our own legislation was ever guided by considerations other than those which at the time were thought best for the interests of England. What this country ought to do was to appeal to the self-interest of other nations, and to point out to them the advantages derivable from free trade. The very fact that we were in possession of those advantages at the same time that we had no means of driving a bargain, was in itself a recommendation of any suggestions which we might offer.

Mr. DISRAELI:—Sir, it is, I think, very much to the credit of the Liberal party that we have at last heard from an hon. Gentleman a free-trade speech. I shall not offer any observations in vindication of those rags and shreds of protection of which the House has just been reminded. I think our opinion upon that subject has been expressed in a manner which cannot be mistaken. Our sincerity as to the course of policy which it has been the wisdom of the country to pursue has been proved by as great sacrifices as can be made by public men. But upon the other side of the House—where hon. Members are, or are supposed to be, the advocates of free trade and Parliamentary Reform—I did not expect to have heard this discussion commenced by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs making a personal and violent attack upon my hon. Friend near me, on the ground that because he advocates the policy of commercial treaties he is showing himself to be a new convert to the principles of free trade. Sir, I never heard that commercial treaties were connected with the abstract principle of a free exchange of commodities between nations. There is nothing very modern, I believe, in the invention of commercial treaties; nor am I aware that the Tory party have ever shown a disrelish to support commercial treaties, if commercial treaties are to be accepted, as we are told by a Member of the Government, as a test of sincerity of belief in the principle of free trade. Why, Sir, commercial treaties, even with France, have been negotiated successfully by Tory Ministers many years before the present commercial treaty with France. There was the commercial treaty of Mr. Pitt, which was only a reproduction of the treaty which Lord Bolingbroke, a Tory Minister, negotiated successfully more than 150 years ago for the interchange of products between England and France on terms much easier than those that at present exist. And why was that treaty negotiated, but not ratified? Why was it defeated? It was defeated through the opposition of the Whig party in this House. Mr. Addison, one of the most distinguished Members that ever sat in this House, and who afterwards was Secretary of State, exerted all his wit and unrivalled powers of humour and composition in ridiculing the arrival of a distinguished foreigner in this country—one Count Tarife, whose mission was to introduce the habit of free exchange of commodities between two great nations. Those powers of ridicule and humour, supported by the unfortunate prejudices of the country, defeated that treaty. Therefore nothing can be more unfounded than to suppose that because we on this side of the House are in favour of commercial treaties we are in fact at all deserting those principles which have been habitually supported. I may almost say for centuries, by the Tory party. But the hon. Under Secretary of State attacks my hon. Friend, and says, "Because you are a supporter of a commercial treaty I hold you up to public reprobation as only a recent convert to the principles of free trade." Now, Sir, if there can be anything opposed to the abstract principles of free exchange upon which unrestricted competition depends, it is, it must be, those regulations or conventions by which reciprocal advantages are sought in the commercial exchange of nations. You are departing from those principles which you take every opportunity of claiming as your own; you are departing from the ground of pure science and inexorable logic the moment you attempt to negotiate the terms upon which commercial exchange shall take place. Now, in the case of the French treaty we came forward with certain advantages which we proposed to exchange for others. That I thought myself at the time, generally speaking, to be a most wise policy. I thought, and always have thought, that anything which favoured commercial exchange between England and France was a policy which each country ought to favour, but the scheme was entirely contrary to those abstract principles of free exchange which you have always upheld. Nothing, then, can be more inconsistent than to reproach any Gentleman on this side because he supports commercial treaties. I remember, Sir, many years ago, introducing the subject of commercial treaties to this House. It was before the hon. Member for Rochdale, a gentleman who on all subjects shows great capacity, was one of its Members. But having supported in that Motion the system of commercial treaties, as one which I thought would, upon the whole, most promote the increase of the commerce of this country, I remember being attacked out of this House by the hon. Member on that subject. I do not know whether the words were uttered aloud, so that we can find them in the authentic record; but I can say from my own personal experience, that no less a personage than Sir Robert Peel said upon that occasion, "Don't you think we have heard the last of commercial treaties?" Well, Sir, we had not heard the last of commercial treaties. A very considerable commercial treaty was destined to be negotiated years after. So shrewd, so sagacious a statesman as Sir Robert Peel, so cautious in expressing his opinion, in 1844 probably was, then, of the belief that we had heard the last of commercial treaties. Yet we had not heard the last of commercial treaties. A most important commercial treaty was afterwards negotiated, and by whom? By the hon. Gentleman the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden). Now, that is a lesson to all of us. It teaches us this—that whatever the value or the truth of abstract principles, it is in their application—in the wise and necessary application of those principles, that is involved the prosperity of nations. Now, Sir, I think we are very much indebted to my hon. Friend for bringing this subject before us; not that I think the observations he has made to-night, or the interesting debate which has followed, will at all advance in this country the question of commercial treaties. I think we have got into a position in which that is impracticable; but the discussion will at least teach the country the position which upon that subject it really occupies. We have no means of negotiation, and it is most unwise, in my opinion, to hold out generally to the country that the Government have the power of negotiating treaties of commercial advantage. The country has accepted the policy of unrestricted competition. If it be dissatisfied with that policy, let it frankly announce its dissatisfaction. But we cannot have the advantage of a policy of unrestricted competition and at the same time, as regards commerce, enjoy the advantages of exchange under diplomatic arrangement—it is impossible at once to enjoy both. The country now wants to have the double advantage, but warning enough has been given. You have been told often and often by Members of this House that whether it regards commerce, or whether it respects navigation, you were too liberal in parting with the advantages and privileges you possessed; but the principles of unrestricted competition were adopted, and it is now too late to inquire whether you are right or wrong. The policy which you then supported was accepted, and by that policy you must, in my opinion, stand. Why, in navigation alone, I remember how constantly you were told that you were needlessly giving up a thousand points. The constant answer was, "Only make the surrender, only endure the sacrifice, and you will see that your example will inspire others." I am not aware myself of the satisfactory returns to which those sacrifices have tended. They appear to me, as far as I can recall them at this moment, to be very slight and mean. But the policy was adopted after great discussion—after frequent appeals to the country—after great debate in this House, and great political consequences; and that you should now endeavour to combine the commercial advantages which accrue from unrestricted competition with the benefits which can only attend upon diplomatic arrangements, is a monstrous effort, which, depend upon it, must end in failure. It is not now for you to come forward, you who favour free trade and commercial treaties, and find fault with the Government because they cannot accomplish such results. You have yourselves resolved that the means which only can bring about these arrangements should be surrendered at discretion. You gave them up without condition, and it is impossible now to resume the position you have lost. But that is no reason whatever why the Government should attempt to carry on negotiations in this matter in the manner that the present Government does. The Government know very well the position they occupy, and we are painfully conscious of it and; the Government, who are always better instructed than the House of Commons, must be doubly conscious of the difficulty of attempts to negotiate commercial treaties. The fault I find with the Government in pretending to negotiate commercial treaties is that they hold out an idea to the country that by an Italian or Austrian treaty they would create a great interchange. They know that it is impossible they can do it. It would be more dignified, to my mind, to hold aloof. Having adopted a commercial system the principle of which is unrestricted competition, it would be more dignified, and I believe, in the end, more successful, if you held aloof, rather than pretend that you can negotiate these treaties. Every day we hear, "We have had a successful commercial treaty with France: why not with Italy, why not with Austria?" You know very well that you cannot have the same results as with France. You had something to give to France. You had that principle of reciprocity to act with, the principle which you have always despised and always condemned. That led to your success—that led to the results which have been obtained, and you claimed that as a discovery which was accomplished more than a century ago by some of the greatest Statesmen that have ever existed in this country. It is past. The age of commercial treaties is past, because you have no means and no materials for negotiation. All you can do is to exercise that moral influence, of which we hear so much, with foreign countries with which you are placed in communication, to lead them by your own example and your own prosperity. Never mind whether it arose from your present or your old system of commerce—for the old as well as the present system of commerce has equally brought prosperity to this country—from the contemplation of that prosperity the conviction will grow in those countries that with immense resources they are producing small revenues; that they are not raising revenues that bear a due relation to their resources, and you may trust to that to lead to reciprocal exchanges and mutual benefits in commercial transactions. But you will gain that as completely, and perhaps sooner, without the embarrassment of commercial treaties than you would with these conventions. I regret that, through the conduct of the Government and through the extraordinary behaviour of the free trade party in patronising artificial agreements of exchange, there has arisen in this country the impression that the best and most politic mode of stimulating commerce is to have recourse to that method. That was a good theory twenty years ago, and not only a good theory but a good theory which could be put in beneficial practice. I will not enter into a discussion now—at all times a barren controversy—whether if, twenty years ago, you had followed the principle of commercial exchange you would have derived more advantage than by suddenly adopting the principle of unrestricted competition. You have adopted unrestricted competition as the principle of your commercial code. By accident certain articles were excepted, and two years ago you used them as the means of negotiating a treaty of commerce with a great country, with a large population, and with very rich and very valuable resources. You have played all your cards, and to attempt at the present moment—to pretend that you can assist and support the commerce of this country by commercial treaties is a mere delusion. No doubt the Government of this country may make use of its legitimate influence to obtain commercial advantages, but to obtain treaties on commercial and political principles are two different subjects; and my hon. Friend is perfectly right in pointing out how important it is that the Government, when holding out the principle of commercial treaties as one highly advantageous to our allies, should not follow at the same time a general policy which irritates the feelings and offends the pride of foreign Governments. In taking that line my hon. Friend is highly to be commended, and no doubt what he has said will lead to suggestions in the public mind which will be advantageous. At the same time I regret very much that hon. Gentlemen opposite, after so many years, during which they have held with so much tenacity abstract opinions on commercial exchange, should now come forward and be agitating the country with the absolute necessity of making artificial arrangements for stimulating the commerce of the country. The plan which they seem now to foster is one not founded on right principles, and practically cannot be carried into effect; and any commercial treaties which England may now negotiate, and which when they are negotiated must be beneficial to the different countries concerned, no man can deny must be negotiated by political influence, and not by the influence of commercial considerations.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: Sir, I have been appealed to during this debate, and therefore I rise to reply to the questions that have been put to me. Otherwise I should have been very little disposed, after the able speech of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, to take part in this discussion. We have had a narrative of the proceedings of the Government since the conclusion of the French treaty in reference to making commercial agreements with foreign countries. The debate has been called interesting, and probably is so. But I have been unable to follow many of the speakers, and throughout the discussion I have observed a certain confusion, as if the speakers were thinking of different subjects, and not discussing a particular Motion. There is a remarkable difference between the hon. Gentleman who submitted the Motion, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. The former reproved the Government for not seizing every opportunity to make commercial bargains with foreign nations. The latter tells us that the age of commercial treaties is past, and that all we can do is to use political influence or pressure, I suppose, to make foreign countries alter their tariffs. We have had an account of the opposition to the French treaty in the time of Mr. Pitt. The French treaty two years ago met a similar opposition at the hands of the right hon. Gentleman, and he appears in those days to have taken up what I understood him to call the former error of the Whigs. But the hon. Gentleman who submitted the Motion entirely approved the last French treaty, and his whole speech was a comment upon the conduct of the Government since that period. With regard to the Belgian treaty, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) asks why the text is not given. I have simply to say that the treaty has been laid on the table, and is to be found in the library, and the hon. Gentleman will there see what it has accomplished. I contend that it has accomplished great benefits for this country. The Belgian treaty contains, first of all, the favoured nation clause, which had no existence before in our relations with Belgium—a most important stipulation, because before the treaty France enjoyed a preference in the Belgian market, and since its conclusion France and England are treated with perfect equality. The second advantage is that we have assimilated the British and Belgian flags. Produce, whether carried by a British or a Belgian ship, is to be admitted for the future upon equal terms, and that is acknowledged by the salt trade of this country to be a great benefit, because heretofore salt imported in English ships was subjected to a differential duty. But the most important result of all is the favoured nation clause, because by putting an end to the system of preference which was given to France in the Belgian market we have reduced the Belgian tariff as against English productions 50 per cent. There were many duties which ranged up to 40 per cent—but, taking an average, the duties upon English textile fabrics imported into Belgium ranged as high as 30 per cent, and they have been reduced to a rate not exceeding

15. I think, therefore, we have accomplished through that Belgian treaty important results for the benefit of England. It has been said by the hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) that our trade with Italy has not increased, and that the Board of Trade Returns contradict those which have been supplied by Her Majesty's Consul General at Naples. I have not seen the returns which my hon. Friend quoted as coming from Naples; but I have no doubt that the figures which he quoted are correct, and they show in the particular articles referred to a probable diminution in the trade with Italy, comparing a certain number of months of 1862 with the same months in 1861. But from what I heard fall from my hon. Friend the Under Secretary (Mr. Layard) I think the Consul General's returns were made in the gross, and it may be quite true that particular articles have fallen off in 1862. I laid on the table only this evening the annual Returns made up to the 31st December, 1862, and they are not as yet printed. I dare say it may turn out that the export trade to Italy in 1862 may be less than in 1861. There are many reasons why that should be the case. The high price of cotton and its diminished production must have had a tendency materially to affect the whole export trade of England. But I think it would be only fair to compare 1860 and 1861 with 1857 and 1858, omitting 1859, which was a year of war, and therefore not to be taken into the comparison for the amount of trade. Now, the whole value of the British exports to Italy in 1857 was £3,246,261, and in 1858 £3,677,663; but in 1860 it was £4,220,112, and in 1861 £5,333,261. Such is the declared value in those years of British exports to Italy—that is to say, to Sardinia, Tuscany, and the Two Sicilies. I think, therefore, when the hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy) looks into the facts of the case, he will find that although the Board of Trade Returns do not quite tally with the statement of my hon. Friend, it is substantially true that the trade with Italy, for the last two years, has shown a tendency to increase and has in fact materially increased. Now, with regard to the Italian treaty, to which my hon. Friend (Mr. S. Fitzgerald) has alluded, as a case in which the Government were not showing the vigilance which they ought in watching our commercial interests, all I can say is, that—as far as my knowledge goes, there having been constant communications between the Foreign Office and the Board of Trade in reference to that treaty—that charge is unfounded. As soon as we found that Italy was about to revise her tariff, and that France was almost forcing from the necessities of the country such a tariff as would be favourable to her interests, Her Majesty's Government set themselves to work, and represented to Italy those reductions which might be made in our interest, and which might well be considered while the tariff was under revision. But there is no doubt that whatever Italy gave to France she would give to England under the operation of the favoured nation clause. It is quite true we have it not in our power to go to different countries and say, "If you make this reduction in your duties, we will make that in ours." We have weeded out of our tariff so many duties that it is not possible for us to make offers of that kind, but I am rather inclined to agree in some observations which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) as to commercial treaties. I, for one, never held the doctrine that we should wait before making reductions of duties in this country favourable to ourselves, because other countries would not co-operate. I have always held we ought to make those reductions which we consider beneficial. I look upon the French treaty as an exception to the general rule, though I would rather not lay down any general rule or abstract principle, because in this matter, as in all other political questions, exceptions are sure to arise. I do not think tariff treaties in themselves desirable, speaking abstractly, or that any country should shackle itself by engagements with other countries as to the particular mode in which it would raise its own revenue. I think in these matters it must obviously be the interest of this country to act for herself. But because the French treaty has been concluded, and there has been a stipulation for the reduction of duties on the part of France, and concessions of duty on the part of England, it does not follow that England is to run about endeavouring everywhere to make tariff treaties. That policy has never been recommended, nor has it been encouraged by the recent proceedings of the Foreign Office. All that has been done is to ask, where we have not had the favoured nation clause, to get it, and we have never ceased to urge upon other countries the necessity of considering the duties which affect our interests. I do not think the experience we have had since the French treaty is at all discouraging. We cannot expect that foreign countries should change their opinions upon protection all at once. We, in this country, were a long time before we were convinced that protection was a bad thing, and I am not certain that all the Members of this House are as yet convinced that it is. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) is, but I do not know that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), for example, is convinced. But, be that as it may, we ought to be indulgent, seeing that strong habits and prejudices are not to be got rid of in a day, and that the course which France has taken in negotiating commercial treaties with other nations is having a great effect in spreading free trade throughout Europe. Whatever reductions are made to France we must strive to get, either in virtue of our moral claims or by the favoured nation clause. I think, then, we have every reason to be satisfied with that commercial policy which has been pursued by this country, and which will gradually bring about in Europe not only the conviction of the soundness of the principle, but the adoption of the practice of free trade.

POOR LAW—(PATRICK BOURKE).

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

LORD JOHN BROWNE:—I feel it my duty to call the attention of the President of the Poor Law Board and the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the removal of a pauper named Patrick Bourke from Leeds to Westport in the county of Mayo, because I believe that the death of this unfortunate old man was undoubtedly hastened, if not caused, by his removal, at the age of seventy-three, during the very worst season of the year, when very insufficiently clothed, and when in a very weak and very delicate state of health; and because I think it right that the Government and the House of Commons should, from time to time, be made aware of the cruel mode in which this most harsh law is frequently administered by the petty parish authorities of some districts in England. Patrick Bourke was a native of the Claremorris and not the Westport Union; but that is a matter of small importance, as he left Ireland forty-three years ago, during the whole of which time he stated that he resided in the town of Leeds, in the country districts surrounding it, or in other towns in that immediate neighbourhood. He was by trade a spectacle-maker; and when he was removed, there was brought over with him a box containing a complete set of the tools required for that trade, together with a large number of spectacles, about twenty of them completed and nine or ten of them in different stages of manufacture; the workmanship of the whole of which showed that he was undoubtedly a most excellent workman. As long as he continued in good health, he said that he never asked for or received a single penny of parochial relief, being well able to support himself by his trade; but at last old age and infirmities began to prey on him, and during the last few years he said that he had on several occasions sought relief in the hospital of the Leeds poorhouse for about a week at a time. Last autumn, however, he had a more serious illness; for, for several months previous to his removal, he was a continuous inmate of the hospital of the Leeds poorhouse. Without any information as to what was to be done with him, Bourke stated that he was, on or about the 30th of December, taken from his sick bed in that hospital, medicine having been given to him on the very evening before his removal, and carried over to the extreme west of Ireland—as a deck passenger in the steamer from Holyhead to Dublin during a terrific storm (by night I believe); on an outside jaunting car for the last ten miles of his journey, also in very bad weather; all this time without any great coat or covering, exposed to the cold, the rain, and the storm, till he was delivered up at the Westport poorhouse, wet through, of course, and as miserable and wretched an object as it is possible to conceive. The porter, who received him, was shocked at his appearance, and asked the removing officer, "How any body of gentlemen (referring to the Leeds Board of Guardians) could send such a weak old man on such a journey in such weather." The removing officer replied, that "he was a paid officer; he had his orders, and he should obey them." Every care was taken of the unfortunate man; but the following morning he got diarrhœa, which his weak and exhausted constitution could not withstand; he got weaker day by day, till he died on the twelfth day, when the medical officer of the poorhouse made the following report to the guardians, to the truth of which report he subsequently swore:—

"I beg to report that Patrick Bourke, aged seventy-three, who was admitted to the hospital on the 1st inst., and labouring under chronic bronchitis, weak heart, and general debility, was removed from Leeds to Westport by the Leeds Board of Guardians in a very inclement season. Immediately after his admission he got severe diarrhœa, under which he sank, notwithstanding the greatest care and attention, and died on the 13th inst. I consider his removal, at such a time and in such a state, injudicious, and calculated to hasten his death."

Now, Sir, I beg the attention of the House, while I show how the unfortunate man was clothed during this cold, winter journey. He had "a body coat, trousers, and waistcoat, of thin black cloth, well worn, two coloured shirts, but no flannel, no drawers, and no great coat." Is it to be wondered at that he was in his grave in a fortnight's time? It is, however, only fair for me to state that when he was crossing in the steamer, he, by "by giving something to one of the crew," as he said, "was allowed to get into the caboose;" that is the cookhouse on deck; and but for this, he said, he never would have reached Dublin alive. He was not, however, allowed to go below, though the removing officer said he never saw worse weather; that it was enough to kill any man; but he added "there was no place below for the likes of him; he could not be put among respectable people;" so the unfortunate old man was left on deck, to get what shelter he could for himself; or if he could get none, to perish from the cold and the wet. To the last, Bourke never ceased to say that his days had been shortened by his journey. If he had known, he said, what they were going to do with him, he would have left the Leeds poorhouse on the morning of his removal; and if they had left him there for another week, that he would have been again able to earn his bread; but, he said, "they hurled me out without mercy, and shortened my days." The Irish Poor Law Commissioners ordered their Inspector, Dr. Brodie, to hold an inquiry on oath into the circumstances of this case. That inquiry has been held, and the evidence taken down in writing by Dr. Brodie himself. I beg to move, Sir, that Dr. Brodie's report, and the evidence on which it is founded, be printed and circulated amongst the Members of this House. I beg the particular attention of the President of the Poor Law Board to that document. If he finds that it bears out the statements which I have made, I trust he will agree with me that this is not a case which ought to be lightly passed over; but that he will order an inquiry to be held in England, similar to that in Ireland, on oath, with the evidence taken down in writing, and that he will select to conduct that inquiry, some man of high character and strict impartiality, who will understand that he is sent to make a bond fide inquiry, and not to obtain a mere legalized form of acquittal. I think it is of the utmost importance that the Irish Poor Law Commissioners should be represented at that inquiry. Unless that is done, I believe the inquiry will be a mockery; and it would be better to have none at all than one at which only one side, and that the accused, shall be represented. Recollect that this is not an isolated case; it is no doubt worse in its details than most of these Irish removals; but there is scarcely an Irish Member of this House, who has not at this moment in his possession some case of undoubted hardship, and of questionable legality; but it is impossible for us in Ireland to ascertain the truth of these cases. In almost every one, the statement of the pauper differs materially from the depositions sent over by the English parochial authorities. In nearly every manufacturing town in the North of England, and in many of the country districts, there are large numbers of labourers, tradesmen, or work-people in the factories, who, though no doubt Irish by birth, have left that country, with all their friends and families, thirty, forty, or fifty years ago, who during the whole of that time had been labouring to increase the wealth of England, have been helping to create those colossal fortunes which have given many an hon. Member his seat in this House, and in the other House too, but who, when they are at last overtaken by old age or infirmity, or disabled by accident, are, as Bourke described it, "hurled out without mercy." The English pride themselves on being a humane and just people, but I ask is this humanity or justice? Is it impossible to get the

Lord John Browne

English Members, who form so large a majority of the votes in this House that we are absolutely at their mercy, to agree to some modification of this barbarous law? Is it unreasonable of us to ask that a man should not be sent back to Ireland after he has left it for over thirty years; that no person should be sent as a deck passenger in the winter season; that persons over the age of sixty (say) should not be removed during the three or six worst months of the winter season; and that all persons, no matter what their age or sex, shall be properly and sufficiently clothed for the journey, and not sent over as Bourke was? Sir, I must now leave this case in the hands of the President of the Poor Law Board for the present. I trust he will not consider it as an attack on him and his Department which he is bound to repel, but rather as a case which it concerns his honour and his credit to have thoroughly and impartially investigated, and I earnestly hope that it will induce him to consider whether it is not possible to procure some change in the Law of Irish Poor Removals, which will prevent the recurrence of such a melancholy case as that which I have felt it my duty to bring before the House of Commons on this occasion. The noble Lord concluded by moving for a Copy—

"Of the Report of Dr. Brodie on the removal of a pauper, named Patrick Bourke, from Leeds to Westport, in the county of Mayo, together with the evidence on which that Report is grounded."

Mr. C. P. VILLIERS said, he did not complain of the noble Lord bringing forward this case, though he had already told the noble Lord that he had had not received any official communication on the matter. He had had a communication, however, that morning from the guardians of the Leeds Union, simply because they had observed a statement made in The Times newspaper and the noble Lord's notice in the Parliamentary Votes. And if the noble Lord would give him a correct statement of the facts of the case, he would officially communicate with the guardians of the union; and if their explanation seemed to require it, a formal inquiry should be instituted with the view of eliciting the truth. He did not collect, from what the noble Lord had said, on what authority he made his statement. The noble Lord had referred to the evidence of the medical man, but had not stated that he held the depositions in his hands or had any authority for his statements.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, that he stated that the medical officer's report was sworn to; and, with respect to bringing the matter forward, he had given eight days' notice of his intention to do so.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that with the communication on the subject from the Leeds Board of Guardians there were enclosed depositions of the removal officer who had acted in the case, who was himself an Irishman, from the master of the workhouse, and the medical officer. These communications, however, were not in consequence of any letter from the Poor Law Board, but had been forwarded to him in consequence of the noble Lord's notice. The guardians expressed their readiness to submit to further inquiry, and to meet by sworn testimony any further statements that might be made to support the charge against them. It appeared that, from a desire to act humanely, the Leeds guardians employed an Irishman, and a person who knew the Irish in Leeds, to remove any natives of Ireland whom they resolved to send to their own country, and the first of the depositions was made by that individual, whose name was John O'Rourke. It was as follows:—

"I am removal officer for Irish paupers for the township of Leeds. On the 30th of December, 1862, Patrick Bourke was taken in a cab at 9 a.m., under a justice's order of removal, to the railway station, to meet the 10-30 a.m. train to Holyhead, en route to Ireland. He did not complain of diarrhoea or bronchitis, and appeared as well as any of his age could. I took his ticket and travelled with him third class. I paid 1s. for a berth, in addition to deck passage, in the cook's department, near a good fire, and he was under cover all night. He had during the voyage bread and butter, and tea, more than sufficient, and as frequently as he asked for it, and I paid for the same, and during the passage I visited him at least half a dozen times. On arriving at Dublin he was taken by rail to Westport, previous to which he had a good breakfast, for which I paid 9d. He had on the journey, from Dublin to Westport, twice bread and cheese and part of a shank of ham with me, which I took for that purpose. After the completion of the journey by rail to Castlebar we had to travel about eight miles by car to Westport, during which time he was covered with an oilskin coat, which I borrowed of the carman to cover him, and from this place he had only to walk about half a mile to the workhouse. During the journey he appeared to be in good health and spirits, and on his arrival at the workhouse he told the master that he had been well treated by the Leeds guardians while in their workhouse, and also by the removal officer while on the journey. The pauper had with him a box, containing about two or more dozen pairs of spectacles. One pair on the journey he sold for 1s.; this and the remainder were left in his possession."

The deposition of Mr. Henry Douglas, master of the workhouse, was as follows:—

"I am master of the Leeds workhouse. Patrick Bourke was admitted on the 5th of May, 1862, on the order of a relieving officer. He does not appear in the medical book, except to be supplied with tobacco. On the 9th of May his name appears in the 'prescription book' to be supplied with medicine of an aperient nature. For several months previous to his removal Patrick Bourke appeared to be in good health and spirits. During the time he was an inmate of the workhouse, I was not aware that he was subject to bronchitis or diarrhoea. He left the workhouse between nine and ten o'clock on the 30th of December, 1862, with the removal officer, previous to which he rose with the other inmates to partake of breakfast at half past seven, and thanked me for the treatment he had received while an inmate of the workhouse, and bade me good morning, and from his manner I thought he was pleased at the prospect of returning to his native country."

Then came the deposition of the medical officer, Mr. Thomas Land—

"I, Thomas Land, medical officer to the Leeds workhouse, do hereby certify that I have carefully looked over the medical books, and find that Patrick Bourke was ordered aperient medicine on the 9th of May, 1862, and a cough mixture on the 10th of November, 1862, since which time I have not seen him professionally. Had he been taken ill at any other time, my attention would have been directed to him."

He might observe, that under the existing law guardians removing a pauper to Ireland might act as the board at Leeds had done, or adopt the alternative of sending a person in charge of the pauper removed only as far as the union of the port where he landed; but such was the desire of the Leeds Board of Guardians to carry out these removals in the most considerate manner possible that they uniformly sent the removal officer to the place where the pauper had claimed to be taken. In this case it appeared that the man himself wanted to go back. He swore to the place of his proper destination, and the guardians sent him there. They said that they had never heard of his alleged illness until the case was brought under public notice by the noble Lord. With respect to what the noble Lord had said of the law being odious or inhuman, he begged distinctly to deny that it deserved that character. It was an amended law, proposed by himself as President of the Poor Law Board two years ago. Anything that could be alleged as savouring of inhumanity in the old law was removed by the existing Act. There were defects in the old law, and they were brought under public notice by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) in such a manner as arrested the attention of Parliament, and was principally instrumental in bringing about a change. The law was now a humane one. A long residence in a particular parish was no longer required to protect a poor Irish man or woman from removal. Residence in one union for a space of three years relieved them from all liability to removal. But for that change in the law, not thousands but perhaps tens of thousands of Irish would have been removable from the distressed districts in Lancashire and Yorkshire during the present winter. Those people were now irremovable, owing to the law which the noble Lord called an inhumane one. Of course, those intrusted to administer the law may have erred, or neglected their duty. That was not his fault. If the noble Lord could bring forward a well-substantiated case of abuse, he should be glad to get the evil redressed. He promised him a full inquiry; but as far as the case yet had gone he did not think the statements made to the noble Lord were borne out by the weight of evidence.

MR. BAINES said, it was not only the duty of Irish Members, but also of English Members, to insist that reasonable and humane care should be taken in the removal of Irish paupers, and of all paupers. In this case, from the evidence which had been furnished to him, and which had been read by his right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board, as well as from his own knowledge of the Poor Law Guardians of Leeds, he was convinced that there had been no known or intentional neglect, but, on the contrary, every care that could be reasonably required. There was certainly a remarkable conflict between the evidence furnished to the noble Lord (Lord John Browne) and that supplied to him; but he asked the House to look at the very complete case made out in refutation of the charge. The two points of importance in the case were—First, was the pauper removed when known to be in such a state of health as to make his removal dangerous or improper; and, secondly, was there anything in the mode of removal calculated to injure his health? On the first point, the master of the Leeds workhouse gave both positive and negative evidence: he said, "For several months previous to his removal Patrick Bourke appeared to be in good health and spirits: he was not aware that he was subject to bronchitis or diarrhoea." Now, this was in absolute contradiction to the statement made by the noble Lord, that the pauper had been for several months a continuous inmate of the hospital, and that he was taken from his bed in the hospital to be removed to Ireland. The removal officer stated, that "during the journey Bourke appeared to be in good health and spirits:" and the medical officer of the Leeds workhouse stated that the pauper had only had medicine twice, on the first occasion within four days after his admission in May last, and the second time, a cough mixture, nearly two months before he was removed; and he added—"since which time I have not seen him professionally: had he been taken ill at any other time, my attention would have been directed to him." Now, that was strong evidence that the man was not known to be in a state of health which made his removal improper. On the second point the evidence seemed completely to negative the imputation of want of care or undue exposure. The pauper was taken in a cab to the railway, and travelled in the same conveyance as the removal officer himself, and was under cover during the whole journey and voyage till he came to Castlebar. It had been said that he was exposed on the deck of the steamer in crossing the Channel; but so far was this from being true that he had a berth, paid for by the removal officer, in the cook's department, under cover all night, near a fire, and with plenty of food. As to food, it was deposed that he had on the steamer, "bread and butter and tea more than sufficient;" that he had breakfasted at Dublin, and that he shared with the removal officer twice of bread, cheese, and ham on the Irish railway. He (Mr. Baines) thought it might be questioned whether cheese and ham were very suitable food if the man was subject to diarrhoea. But it was not known that he had such a complaint, and the pauper had the same fare as the officer. Then for the last few miles the man was conveyed, from Castlebar to Westport, on an outside car; but this was, he supposed, the only mode of conveyance in that part of the country, and the officer borrowed an oilskin coat for the pauper from the driver of the car. He was conveyed to the workhouse at Westport, and the officer deposed that the pauper had "appeared in good health and spirits" during the journey, and that on his arrival he told the master he had been well treated both in the workhouse at Leeds and on the journey. This narrative seemed completely to negative the charge of inhumanity of any kind or at any stage. When the President of the Poor Law Board mentioned that the removal officer was an Irishman, there was an expression of something like derision; but he hoped no Irish Member joined in that derision. To him it seemed that the employment of an Irishman for that service was some guarantee of fellow feeling towards the pauper. It was alleged that the weather on the 30th of December was very inclement; but they would all remember that the weather at that time was singularly mild. He had thought it his duty to make these few remarks as Member for the borough of Leeds, and he declared his strong conviction that the treatment of paupers at Leeds was decidedly humane and liberal. He would only, in conclusion, invite and challenge the fullest investigation into the case.

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, the statements which had been so triumphantly referred to by his right hon. Friend might or might not be well founded, but they were worth just as much as the statements of any other persons that were charged with a breach of the law. He had no wish to controvert those statements; but what Irish Members had a right to complain of was, that when any of these acts of injustice were alleged, whether truly or untruly, and a prima facie case was made out, Irish boards of guardians possessed no power of obtaining an inquiry or of getting anything like justice. When the 24 & 25 Vict., c. 75, 76, were passed, the Irish Poor Law Commissioners directed Irish boards of guardians to bring under their notice any cases of alleged breach of these Acts, and sent a form of questions to be put to the pauper. In a case which had come under his notice a long statement was accordingly sent to the Commissioners, with the sworn depositions of the pauper, and the Commissioners sent down their own inspector to inquire. But the end of that elaborate investigation was, that the Commissioners wrote back remarking that the depositions were entirely at variance with the statement of the clerk of the English union, and that their power of inquiry did not extend beyond Ireland. What was asked for now was, that somebody on the part of the Irish Poor Law Board should be present at the examination at Leeds in order to see fair play. That was not the only case of irregularity in the removal of paupers from England. In the report of the Poor Law Commissioners for 1862 there was a grave complaint of habitual breach of the law in this respect, and a large number of instances, with full details, were given. The Poor Law Board did not deny those allegations, but was obliged to own that in many of the cases adverted to irregularities had occurred. In referring to the subject the Secretary to the Board said that in the event of such misconduct being repeated it would be necessary to consider whether a penalty should not be imposed on offenders. He hoped, therefore, that some means would be taken to compel the removing authorities to observe the law.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he thought the noble Lord deserved the thanks of the country for bringing this case forward. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board was personally to blame in the matter, as he was of a humane and kindly disposition. He would not go into questions of ham, cheese, or oilskin coats; but could say, from his own experience, that paupers were frequently removed who were utterly unfit for a journey. Perhaps no Member of the House saw more of the Irish poor than he did, and cases were constantly occurring within his knowledge that satisfied him of the truth of what he was now saying. People came to him who had been discharged from hospitals, or who, if not discharged from hospitals, were in a state of disease, and who said they could not apply to the Poor Law authorities, as, if they did, they would be removed to Ireland. The question was one of humanity that addressed itself to the feelings of every man in that House, and he thought that something ought to be done, either by a change in the law or by the interference of the guardians to prevent a recurrence of such cases of cruelty and hardship. In his opinion what was required was a comprehensive regulation, prohibiting the removal of any one without the certificate of a competent officer that he or she was in such a state of health as to be fit for removal.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he was glad to see the manner in which the English Members of the House had received the statements that were made on this subject.

He wished, however, to warn the President of the Poor Law Board not to place implicit credence in the statements of those who were accused of violations of the law. He hoped the present case would be inquired into; and, whatever the result of it might be, he was satisfied the English Members would never consent to such irregularities. The law in its amended form was, on the whole, humane, giving to the Irish poor in this country rights which they never possessed before. He was convinced, that if strictly and fairly carried out, it would to a certain extent mitigate the harshness of any removal to Ireland.

MR. HENNESSY said, he doubted whether the law, even in its present form, deserved the eulogiums of the hon. Member for Dungarvan. In Ireland there was no power of removing English paupers to England, whereas there was here a power of transferring Irish paupers to Ireland.

MR. ROEBUCK: Are there any English paupers in Ireland?

MR. HENNESSY:—Yes, and political paupers too. He wished to know whether the Irish Government had made any inquiry into the seventy-three cases of irregularity and breaches of the law mentioned by a previous speaker. The Irish Commissioners said that their jurisdiction did not extend beyond Ireland. What steps then had the Irish Government taken in this matter?

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he trusted that the publicity given to the case would render it impossible but that an immediate and a searching inquiry should take place, with the view of remedying any evils that might exist, and preventing a repetition of such evils. He could not but express his astonishment at the warmth of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, because the right hon. Gentleman was greatly mistaken if he supposed that any portion of the House underrated the importance of those alterations in the Poor Law which he was so instrumental in effecting. He (Lord Claud Hamilton), however, thought that in many instances the law was not carried out. He was of opinion that the House had heard enough to be convinced that there was wanted some system by which the Irish Poor Law Commissioners could make their complaints in such a way as to ensure an inquiry into them. At present it appeared they could only write letters on the subject, having no jurisdiction beyond their own country.

SIR ROBERT PEEL stated, that when a complaint was made by a board of guardians in Ireland, an Inspector was instructed to inquire into the matter. He reported to the Poor Law Commissioners in Dublin, who, in turn, reported to the Chief Secretary's office. A communication was then made to the Home Secretary, by whom the case was transferred to the President of the Poor Law Board. Such was the course followed in the seventy-three cases referred to by the hon. and learned member for the King's County. These cases were now under the consideration of the English Board, and he had no doubt that justice would be done. He was glad that the case of Patrick Bourke had been brought before the House; because, if there had been any irregularity or violation of the law, it would, no doubt, be remedied by the full inquiry promised by the President of the Poor Law Board.

PRISON MINISTERS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he rose to move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the law relating to the religious instruction of prisoners in the county and borough prisons in England and Scotland. His Motion was intended to redeem a pledge which he gave last Session on the occasion of the discussion of a Bill introduced by the hon. and learned Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy), when he expressed the opinion that the law was in a state which required some alteration, in justice to that large body of prisoners who were not members of the Established Church. He would state what the law was which he proposed to alter. The Bill related only to what were termed borough and county prisons, not to convict prisons which were under the immediate charge of Government, and where the prisoners were under sentence of penal servitude. County prisons were regulated by the Act of 4 Geo. IV., c. 64, and borough prisons by 2 & 3 Vict., c. 56. The law of Scotland was more recent—23 & 24 Vict., c. 105, but it contained provisions of the same character as those in the English Law. The 4 Geo. IV., c. 64, s. 28, required the justices in quarter sessions to nominate for each prison within their jurisdiction a clergyman of the Church of England as chaplain, and empowered them to award him a salary proportioned to the number of prisoners which the prison was calculated to receive, and payable out of the rate applicable to the maintenance of the prison. The general duties of the chaplain were defined to be, the performance of the morning and evening services of the Church of England on Sundays, Christmas days, and Good Fridays, and the frequent visiting every room and cell occupied by prisoners, for the purpose of directing such books to be distributed and read, and such lessons to be taught, as he may deem proper for the religious and moral instruction of the prisoners. It is, however, provided that—

“If any prisoner shall be of a religious persuasion different from that of the Established Church, a minister of such persuasion, at the special request of such prisoner, shall be allowed to visit him or her at proper and reasonable times, under such restrictions imposed by the visiting justices as shall guard against the introduction of improper persons, and as shall prevent improper communications.”

But although, at the special request of any such prisoner, a minister of the church or persuasion to which he belongs is allowed to attend, that in no way modifies the right or duty of the chaplain to visit and minister to prisoners of all persuasions. There was one modification, only applicable to prisoners under sentence of death. In this case, if the prisoner makes a request to be attended by a minister of his own persuasion, the chaplain is not to attend him, it being felt unseemly to have controversial discussions going on in presence of a prisoner, and within a few hours of his execution. That is the law at present with regard to the borough and county prisons in England, and in its main features it is the same in Scotland. The Bill was not confined to any religious class or denomination, but its application would chiefly refer to Roman Catholic prisoners, for the reason that there were but comparatively few prisoners belonging to any Protestant dissenting denomination, while in some prisons there was a large number of Roman Catholics. Since these Acts were passed, intercourse between all parts of the United Kingdom had become much more frequent, and in many large towns of Great Britain the Irish formed a considerable part of the working population, and unfortunately contributed largely to the crime of the district. A Return had been moved for with reference to this subject by his noble Friend the Member for Arundel, which extended to May, 1862, from which he found that the whole number of Roman Catholics in county and borough prisons in Great Britain was at that time 3,371, exclusive of convict prisons, which contained about 1,400. With regard to convict prisons, arrangements had been made for the payment of Roman Catholic priests, under direction of the Secretary of State out of funds granted by Parliament for the purpose; but with regard to those 3,371 Roman Catholics in the county and borough prisons no provision had been made by the existing law. The distribution of those prisoners was very unequal. There were of Roman Catholic prisoners 67 in Birmingham, 94 in Stafford, 141 in Kirkdale, 124 in Wandsworth, 183 in the House of Correction, Westminster; 207 in Manchester, 147 in Salford, and 485 in Liverpool, being more than one-half of the prisoners in that goal. In Glasgow and Edinburgh there was also a very large number of Roman Catholic prisoners. There was no provision by law for the religious instruction of these prisoners by ministers of their own faith, except the special Request clause, and the return showed that comparatively few made the request. This fact had been used as an argument against any further provision being made, but the class of persons who are found in our gaols are not likely to appreciate religious instruction. It would, no doubt, be the same with other denominations; the chaplain of the Established Church would have little to do if he had only to attend to those who made special request for his attendance. That fact constituted an additional obligation on the Legislature to see that means of religious instruction were placed within their reach. The provisions of the Bill were not compulsory, but permissive. It had been frequently stated by visiting justices that the special request clause tied their hands, and he proposed to remove all doubt on the subject by giving power to the local authorities (that is, justices in counties, visiting justices in boroughs, and in Scotland those who had the control of prisons), where the number of prisoners not belonging to the Established Church was so large as in their judgment to render it expedient, to appoint a minister whose special duty it should be to attend to the religious instruction of the prisoners of that denomination; and, if they should think fit, that they should pay a reasonable sum to any such minister as remuneration for his services, the sum to be charged on the same fund as the salaries of the other officers. There would be cases in which the numbers were not so large as to require a special appointment to be made, and in such cases it was proposed that the justices might permit a minister, without any special request, to attend the prisoners of any particular denomination, if they thought fit. A register of prisoners would be kept showing the religious persuasion of each, and that register would be open to the inspection of any minister appointed or permitted under this Bill to visit the gaols. He proposed to limit the statutable obligation imposed on the chaplains belonging to the Established Church to visit prisoners, so that that obligation should not extend to prisoners who were attended by ministers of other denominations. He ought perhaps to mention that by the law as it now existed in Ireland ample provision was made for the object which he was seeking to secure in England. In Ireland the law required that a chaplain of the Established Church should be appointed for every gaol, and it was in the power of the grand jury to provide for the appointment of a Presbyterian or a Roman Catholic chaplain, according as either denomination was most numerous in particular parts of the country. The effect of that law, although only an empowering statute as regarded the appointment of chaplains of the two last denominations, had been that in almost all the prisons of Ireland chaplains of one or other of those religious bodies had been appointed. He might also refer to the practice adopted in the military prisons, where that was done which he proposed to do with respect to civil prisons—namely, to divide the Protestant and the Roman Catholic prisoners into two classes, and to allow a Roman Catholic priest to attend to the latter. He knew the strong feeling entertained on the matter, and the jealousy which existed in regard to granting additional privileges to Roman Catholic priests. But, looking to the large number of Roman Catholics in the prisons, he thought some attempt ought to be made to remedy what was undoubtedly a serious grievance. It was a remarkable fact that in all Ireland, where the Roman Catholic prisoners were under the care of chaplains of their own persuasion, the total number of such prisoners in the county and borough gaols was about 1,000 less than the corresponding class in England, in May last, the date of the Returns to which he had referred. As both countries were under the same constitution, and had the same Established Church, he could not see why there should be any difference in principle between the law of England and Ireland on the subject. He trusted that the Bill would be allowed to be introduced. He proposed to fix the second reading for that day fortnight, and he earnestly hoped that it would be discussed in a spirit of Christian charity, without any attacks upon the religious belief of any portion of our fellow subjects, but with a simple desire to do by others who differed from us in creed that which we would wish to be done towards ourselves under similar circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

MAJOR HAMILTON said, that he had understood the right hon. Baronet to have said that under the Bill justices of the peace in Scotland could order the payment of the chaplains who might be appointed. Now, it was well known that the only source from which the money could come for such purposes in Scotland was the county, and the money of the county could be obtained only through the Commissioners of Supply.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would ask the Home Secretary how he could reconcile it to himself to afford direct and compulsory privileges to Roman Catholic chaplains, when the Constitution of 1688 emphatically declared that the Roman Catholic religion should not be encouraged. The measure came before the House bearing the distinct lineaments of the Roman Catholic priesthood, and he objected to conferring further privileges or giving any additional money to support an imperium in imperio so hostile to civil and political liberty. At present Roman Catholic prisoners could obtain the ministrations of priests of their own Church if they desired it, and the Bill was therefore unnecessary. During the recess the right hon. Baronet had actually furnished those priests with keys to admit them to the cells of prisoners. Was that consistent with the civil and religious freedom of those so-called Roman Catholic prisoners who did not desire to see their priests? Why, the very acts which brought these men within the walls of a prison were directly taught in the books of Roman Catholic writers. The Returns obtained on the Motion of the noble Lord who represented Arundel (Lord Edward Howard) during the last Session clearly showed that not one-tenth of the prisoners avowing themselves to be Catholics ever sent for the priest at all. On the second reading of the Bill he would adduce evidence as to the doctrines and discipline of the Roman Catholic Church.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished to thank the Government for having introduced the Bill. At the same time, he would point out what he regarded as a weak point in it—the discretion left to the magistrates, who, in many instances, might be the members of a bigoted board. There was no reason why twenty Roman Catholic prisoners, if their names were on the registry, should not have the advantage of the ministration of a clergyman of their own Church, as well as if their number happened to be 50 or 100. It was, he thought, but right to add, that if there were as large a number of Roman Catholic prisoners in the gaols in England as the right hon. Baronet had stated, the fact was to be accounted for by the circumstance that it was the poorest classes among the Irish people who found their way to Liverpool and the other large English towns, and that the law with respect to removability operated with extreme harshness in their case.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER suggested that the number of Roman Catholic prisoners in a gaol should simply affect the amount of salary to be paid, adding that he felt assured he was merely speaking the sentiments of the clergymen of that Church, when he said they were perfectly ready to minister to the wants of every prisoner in every gaol in England without one farthing of remuneration. The regulations, he added, which prevented a Roman Catholic priest from visiting a prisoner unless at his own request operated most harshly; those who were hardened in crime, and who needed his ministration most, being the very persons who never made such a request. In illustration of the justice of the statement he might allude to a case which had been mentioned to him by a highly-respected clergyman—the Rev. Canon Oakley—in which the father and mother of a prisoner had begged of him to afford spiritual aid to a son of theirs, who was in gaol, but who had not asked for his services, and whom, in consequence, he was prevented by the prison regulations from visiting. Moreover, an Irishman did not understand the question, “Do you wish to see a minister of your own persuasion?” He supposed, when the word “minister” was used, that a Protestant minister was implied; and thus many difficulties arose from prison authorities speaking to prisoners in a language they did not understand.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was glad the hon. Members for Dungarvan and Dundalk had expressed their satisfaction with the Bill as far as it went, and it was only natural that they should do so. By the admission of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State it was not asked for by the prisoners, and it would be extremely distasteful to the whole body of justices. It was then a concession to Roman Catholic priests—in fact, an invasion of the civil and religious freedom of the prisoners. He believed that the Bill would be received by the country as a political concession on the part of the Government which they would lament; and he trusted that on the second reading the House would prevent the forcing into the cells of the unwilling prisoners the representatives of a priesthood whose success in moral instruction was illustrated by the enormous preponderance of Roman Catholic prisoners in our gaols. He would not attempt the discourtesy of dividing the House now; but he must enter his protest against the Bill in the name of the Roman Catholic prisoners, who had manifested their distaste for the ministrations intended for them, and also, by their acquiescence in the teaching of the clergy of the Established Church, had shown, so far as they were competent to judge of their own moral requirements, that their condition in England was far preferable to that which the right hon. Gentleman thought more desirable in Ireland. He knew not how the Bill was recommended to the right hon. Gentleman except as a matter of political necessity; and he trusted that on the second reading, if there was a political pressure on one side, hon.

Gentleman except as a matter of political necessity; and he trusted that on the second reading, if there was a political pressure on one side, hon.

Members would show there was a pressure on the other.

MR. HENNESSY said, he thanked the Government for having fulfilled the promise which they made last Session, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) for having suggested the measure, precedents for which were to be found in the action of the Earl of Derby, when Lord Stanley, with regard to the colonies, and in the warrant of the Secretary for War under that noble Earl's Government with respect to military prisons.

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT said, that the Bill involved a great principle—namely, that where there was a small congregation of Roman Catholics there a priest was to be provided and to be paid by the country. If that were the principle, why was it not to be extended to villages and towns as well as prisons? He believed this was the principle involved, and the result would be that the Protestant Church must make up its mind speedily to divide the revenues of the Church with the Roman Catholics.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that in answer to a question which had been asked by an hon. Member he had to state that with regard to the source from which the cost was to come in Scotland, it was proposed that where there was no special fund it should come out of the funds applicable to the expenses of the prison. In reply to the hon. and learned Member for Reading (Mr. Serjeant Pigott), he also had to remark that the case of persons in prison was entirely different from that of the free inhabitants of towns and villages.

COLONEL STUART said, he wished to ask that the second reading of the Bill should not be taken in so short a period as a fortnight.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the Bill was printed, and would, he hoped, be circulated on the following day. He would fix the second reading for that day fortnight; but if further time was generally desired for the consideration of the measure, he should not object to give it.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the amendment of the Law relating to the Religious Instruction of Prisoners in County and Borough Prisons in England and Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Sir GEORGE GREY and Mr. BRUCE.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 24.]

Mr. Newdegate

SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

MR. MILNER GIBSON moved for a Select Committee, "to inquire into the present system of legislation with regard to undertakings requiring the authority of Private Acts of Parliament, and whether any improvements can be made therein."

MR. WHALLEY said, that although he thought the House had already before it sufficient information to enable it to legislate upon this subject, he should not oppose the appointment of this Committee. At the same time, he hoped that it would not follow the course pursued in 1846, 1853, and 1858, but would consider whether the time had not arrived when the House ought to delegate its functions in this respect to some permanent tribunal to be constituted to exercise them.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed,

"To inquire into the present system of legislation with regard to undertakings requiring the authority of Private Acts of Parliament, and whether any improvements can be made therein."

MR. HADFIELD said, he would move that it be an instruction to the Committee to relieve parties resisting the taking away from them of property by Private Bills from the House fees, shorthand-writers' expenses, and other costs.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to consider the justice and propriety of exempting parties who shall appear before any Committee to resist the taking of property belonging to them, under powers proposed to be taken under a Private Bill, or for Clauses respecting the same, from the payment of fees, or the expense of shorthand-writers' notes, or other House fees."

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, it was not usual to instruct a Committee to do that which it could do without such an instruction. Of course, the whole question would be considered by the Committee, and that of fees was within the scope of the inquiry. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press his addition.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MILNER GIBSON, MR. LOWE, Colonel WILSON PATTEN, MR. ADAIR, MR. WHALLEY, MR. RICHARD HODGSON, Lord STANLEY, Mr. EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, Mr. WALPOLE, Mr. MASSEY, Mr. PULLER, Mr. HASSARD, Mr. PAULL, Mr. CHARLES FORSTER, and Mr. LIDDELL.

House adjourned at half after

QUALIFICATION FOR OFFICES ABOLITION BILL—[BILL 4.]

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HADFIELD moved the second reading of this Bill.

MR. BAINES seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. NEWDEGATE rose to move an Amendment that the Bill be read that day six months. The hon. Member who had moved the second reading seemed to think that the House would, as a matter of course, assent to the Motion. There had certainly been a small majority in that House for the Bill, but there was also a considerable minority whom he seemed to think would not venture to express their opinion. He seemed to think there was no other House of Legislature, although last year the House of Lords, by way of informing the hon. Member of their determination, rejected the Bill by a majority of thirty-three, after the third reading had been carried in the House of Commons by a majority of thirteen only. The hon. Member was therefore carrying on warfare at once against the House of Lords and against the Church of England. Upon every possible occasion the Liberals took the most direct means to destroy the order of things which the law authorized. That might be political consistency—it might be progress in their sense—but it meant a downward course towards the absolutism of democracy. When the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed, a declaration was retained which obliged the members of municipal corporations to declare on their acceptance of office that they would not use the influence, power, and functions of their corporate office in order to assail, weaken, or spoliage the Church of England. The Bill even went further than absolving them from these obligations, for it now proposed that any one who held office, commission, or patent, of any kind, under the State, should be at liberty to use the powers, functions, and influence of their position to attack the Church of England. They were asked to reverse the principle on which the whole course of our legislation for thirty-two years had proceeded. He trusted, therefore, that the majority of the House would reconsider this subject, and refuse to give the Bill a second reading.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 63: Majority 11.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Tomorrow.

AND CHILDREN BILL—[BILL 15.]

Order for Second Reading read.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that while he retained the provisions which he had introduced into the measure on this subject which he brought forward two years ago, rendering those who committed aggravated assaults on women and children liable to corporal punishment, he had, in deference to what appeared to be the feeling of the House, so far modified his original proposal as now to provide that such punishment should be inflicted only upon a third conviction for the same offence. He, however, proposed that an additional term of imprisonment should be given for the first and second time the offence was committed. He hoped the consequence of the enactment of those provisions would be the diminution of the class of crimes against which it was his object to legislate. In view of the necessity of repressing offences of this character he trusted that even those who were opposed to corporal punishment would permit the Bill to be read the second time. If, when the Bill went into Committee, he found that there was a strong feeling against the infliction of corporal punishment, even upon a third conviction, he should not be unwilling to abandon that provision, in consideration of the benefits that would result from the adoption of the remaining provisions. The noble Lord concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. ALDERMAN SIDNEY could not see any ground for the introduction of the Bill. In his judgment the Law was not defective in its present mode of punishment. He thought it would be most inexpedient to deal too harshly with offences of this kind, because where the husband had undergone corporal punishment on the complaint of the wife, the effect would be to provoke lasting estrangement between them. He believed the Bill, if carried, would increase the mischief it was intended to allay, and therefore he should move that it be read a second time that day six months.

MR. BRISCOE seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, it was, to say the least of it, very inconvenient, after the House had deliberately expressed an opinion in reference to a particular measure by rejecting it, that the same question, without any intermediate change of circumstances to warrant it, should again be submitted to the consideration of the House. This question was settled when the House agreed to the Acts for the consolidation of the criminal law, in 1861. The noble Lord (Viscount Raynham) then proposed an addition to one of the Bills, in effect the same as the Bill he now proposed; and if he (the Attorney General) recollected rightly, he did not find a seconder; at any rate, the House negatived the proposition without a division. That was in 1861; and could the noble Lord say that any change of circumstances had occurred to warrant the House to undo that which it deliberately did in 1861? On the contrary, he (the Attorney-General) believed that a reference to the records of the police courts would show that the offence had decreased. Beyond this, however, he contended that it was wrong to introduce a change in the Law after it had been well considered and assumed the form of consolidation. The proposal of the noble Lord was a direct reversion to the law of 1829. Since then a Select Committee had reported that sixteen years should be the maximum age of any person who should be flogged in prison, and he did not think the House would be disposed now to disagree with that conclusion. He should support the Amendment.

MR. BENTINCK thought the noble Lord (Viscount Raynham) deserved great credit for the energy and perseverance he had shown in pushing forward the measure. He (Mr. Bentinck) believed that the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Alderman Sidney) was altogether wrong in saying the law was now efficient. He undertook to say, on the contrary, that the law had altogether failed to prevent the offences against which it was aimed. He was glad to hear the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (the Attorney General) say it was inconvenient to bring forward Bills upon which the House had already deliberately expressed an opinion, without any intermediate change of circumstances to warrant such a course. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would adhere to that opinion on the Wednesdays throughout the Session. The hon. and learned Gentleman said it was wrong to change the law when once it had been deliberately settled. He (Mr. Bentinck) hoped, if any distinguished Member of the House introduced a Reform Bill, the hon. and learned Gentleman would repeat those words. In spite, however, of the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he (Mr. Bentinck) maintained that the present state of the Law was utterly ineffective; and he hoped the House would show its sense of the horror with which it regarded these assaults by giving leave to introduce this Bill.

The House divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 153: Majority 110.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill put off for six months.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, February 19, 1863.

ITALY—ROME.—EXPLANATION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he wished to call attention to a statement made on Tuesday evening by his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in answering some observations of his (the Marquess of Normanby's) in reference to the Roman Question. His noble Friend then quoted a despatch of his (the Marquess of Normanby's) written in 1849, for the purpose of showing that all the policy of interference which had characterized the career of himself and his present chief was conformable to a policy laid down in that despatch. On looking at the original draught, he found that the noble Earl had arrived at that conclusion by omitting the sentence immediately before and the sentence immediately after what he quoted. It was a long despatch written to Lord Palmerston on the subject of a proposal to the French Government that it should join with Austria in recommending the Pope to grant reforms, and the omissions would be apparent when their Lordships heard the complete quotation—

"France has, therefore, to consider her own peculiar position from the very outset. If England gives advice consistent with her disinterested desire for the progress of rational liberty—then, if her advice is taken, she has the credit and the satisfaction of having acted up to her principles; and if it is disregarded, it is consistent with her known habits of non-intervention that she retires from the offer without discredit. But France has 30,000 men at Rome."

The first and the last of these sentences had been omitted by his noble Friend in quoting the despatch. The reference to England was incidental, and had no relation whatever to the general policy of the Government.

EARL RUSSELL said, the noble Marquess had proved by the quotation that he (Earl Russell) was completely accurate in what he stated the other day. He stated what had been written by the noble Marquess for the purpose of showing his noble Friend's opinion that England might give advice in favour of rational liberty, which if it were taken would reflect much credit, and if not taken would reflect no discredit on England. He quoted the general axiom for that purpose, and the exact question then in agitation had nothing to do with his argument. He had promised his noble Friend to produce one or two despatches which had not been presented to Parliament, or extracts from them, as he had referred to those despatches, and he should be prepared to act upon that promise.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY denied that there was anything in the despatch which laid down a general axiom.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he understood the general rule to be this—that no public officer who had left office was at liberty to make use publicly of any document which had come into his possession while in office, except it had been published; and no Minister was at liberty to read anything from a public document, without at once laying it on the table.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, as he had explained the other night to his noble Friend on the cross benches (Earl Grey), it was impossible for him to read from any document which was not published, for he had none in his possession. Like every other public officer, he had left all documents which came to him while in office in the archives of the place where he resided.

THE CONVICT GILBERT.

EXPLANATION.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he wished to inform the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury) that he had obtained the following particulars respecting the case of the convict Gilbert, which he had been unable to supply to his noble Friend the other evening:—

“G. J. Gilbert, convicted at the Hants Quarter Sessions, in October, 1851, of stealing money and sentenced to seven years’ transportation (having been twice before convicted, once of felony, and once summarily). Released by licence, in the usual course, dated the 8th of May, 1855. Again convicted at Hants Quarter Sessions, in June, 1856, of robbery with violence, and sentenced to four years’ penal servitude. This sentence he underwent in full. He was again convicted at the Hants Assizes in July, 1862, of murder with rape, and executed.”

PRISON DISCIPLINE.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in rising to call Attention to the present State of Discipline in Gaols and Houses of Correction, said, that the subject was one of considerable importance, although it might at first sight appear to be one of an uninteresting character. There were two classes into which the criminal population naturally fell—the convicts sentenced to penal servitude for various periods from three years and upwards to life, to which class the Royal Commission recently appointed had exclusive reference; and the prisoners sentenced to imprisonment in county and borough gaols for terms of from one day to two years. He did not intend to refer on this occasion to the first of these classes—it was entirely to the treatment of this latter class that his remarks would be directed. There were at present in England 87 county gaols, five “liberties,” as they were called, of which he knew nothing, and 56 borough gaols, making a total of 148. Some still continued to be conducted on the associated system, in others the separate system was adopted, and others included both the associated and separate systems. Certain smaller gaols had of late years, particularly since the establishment of a constabulary force in counties was made compulsory, shown a tendency to merge into the larger county gaols, thus securing greater uniformity and greater efficiency of discipline. By the last Returns it appeared that there were no less than 130,000 prisoners committed to these gaols within the twelve months. This did not include summary convictions—there were very nearly 400,000 persons proceeded against summarily within the year, and between 260,000 and 280,000 acquitted. The average daily number of persons in those prisons was between 16,000 and 17,000. It would be seen that these 130,000 prisoners really constituted the great bulk of our criminal population—because, after all, in the different Government prisons at Pentonville, Milbank, Dartmouth, Chatham, and other places, there were not more than 6,000 convicts, according to the last Returns. He thought few judges would say that a large proportion of these 130,000 were not as criminal in act and intention as the convicts who were sentenced to long periods of penal servitude. It was a great evil in the system on which our judicial statistics were made up that they were always a year and a half or so in arrear, and the last Returns now before Parliament related only to the year 1860-1. These Returns showed a very startling increase in crime. During that year it appeared that the number of commitments to different gaols had increased by 13,000 persons, showing an increase of 13 per cent over the preceding year; the recommitments had increased by 3,400 persons, or

9 per cent; and there had been an increase of 33 per cent in the unfortunate class of criminal lunatics. In almost every head of criminal offence there appeared to have been an increase. He would state to their Lordships what had been the increase in the various kinds of crime. In those official statistics there were generally six heads, and he should read for their Lordships the commitments under those heads for the year 1860-1—

“Increase of crime, 1860-1.—1. Offences against person; total increase=14 per cent; murder, increase of 30 per cent over 1859-60; attempts to murder, 26 per cent; shooting at, &c., with intent to maim, 2 per cent; rape, &c., 23 per cent; other offences, 21 per cent; assaults with bodily harm, 23 per cent; common assaults, 28 per cent; assaults on police officers in the execution of their duty, 24 per cent. 2. Offences against property with violence; total increase=38 per cent; burglary, increase of 40 per cent over 1859-60; house-breaking, 56 per cent; breaking into dwelling-houses and shops, and stealing, 23 per cent; robbery and attempts to rob by persons armed, 31 per cent. 3. Offences against property, without violence; total increase=11 per cent; various larcenies=9 per cent; increase also under receiving, embezzlement, false pretences, &c. 4. Malicious offences against property; total increase=18 per cent. 5. Forgery; total increase=16 per cent. 6. Miscellaneous; total increase=19 per cent.

He thought there was enough in that state of things to create very serious alarm, and he did not think there was any reason to suppose that in the following year (1861-2) there was any diminution in the number of these offences. Their Lordships, from their own experience, could form a tolerably accurate idea how matters had stood in the portion of 1862-3 already expired. They were aware that during a very recent period there was such insecurity in the streets of London that it was dangerous to walk about after nightfall. The two principal points he wished to bring before their Lordships that evening were—First, that in a great many of the gaols, in a large proportion of the gaols and houses of correction in the kingdom, there was an insufficiency of penal discipline; and, secondly, that the different systems on which these prisons were administered were so various and diverse, and presented such discrepancies, as to very much impair the administration as a whole. As regarded the sanitary condition of those establishments, there was, he believed, little to complain of; but the question at issue was, how far the punishment inflicted in them was made effective and sufficient. It might be taken for granted, although so many various systems were in use, that “the separate system” was the one which was generally intended to be the basis of our prison discipline; and the great question was, how to carry the sentences into practical execution; and the sentences inflicted by Criminal Courts were carried out under rules applying to labour and dietary and to cells and separation. The judges generally coupled their sentences of imprisonment with hard labour. An Act of Parliament set out the limits within which hard labour was to be enforced. Ten hours were intended to be the maximum; but he doubted whether such a maximum had ever been reached. He was sure that in the large majority of cases, the maximum was very much below the Parliamentary standard. In some prisons a maximum of six hours was laid down; but then came deductions which brought it down to some three or four hours. There were prisons in which the labour was of such a character as that prisoners were able to transfer it from one to another; and in other prisons, owing to the interference of well-intentioned theorists—who thought it practicable to make moral influences a substitute for hard labour—the visiting justices had come to the conclusion that the best mode of solving the difficulty was to give the prisoners no work at all. Again, as appeared from the report of the Inspector for the Southern Division, there was in some gaols a positive insufficiency of means of labour at all. As to dietary, in a large number of gaols meat was given to the prisoners every day in the week, either in the solid form or as soup. This was a serious question; but when they examined the subject a little further, they would find that in many cases there were certain luxuries, certain comforts, coupled with what might be called the more ordinary dietary, which made it a very grave question whether the dietary generally given to prisoners was not in excess of what it ought to be. In a large number of prisons tea, cocoa, milk, and, in some cases, beer were given; and it was stated that at Portland the convicts got an allowance of treacle and pudding, to make the other portion of their dietary still more palatable. Certainly, no one who looked at the scale of diet that had been issued by the Government could say that it erred on the side of severity; moreover, it was important to remember that the medical officer of a prison was empowered, at his discretion, to order an additional allowance of food to any prisoner. He was not prepared to say that such discretion was generally abused, but he did say there was the greatest possible discrepancy between the quantities of extra diet given in different gaols. Taking two prisons, in which the number of prisoners was about equal and in which the scale of dietary was about the same, he found that in one of them the extra dietary was given in the proportion of 1 to 8 while in the other it was only given in the proportion of 1 to 35 or 40. There seemed to be no rule on the subject. In considering the question of dietary, it was desirable to bear in mind the food at the disposal of persons in the same class of life under other circumstances. He did not know what was done in workhouses in the North of England, but he did know that in those in the south the cases were rare in which meat was granted to the inmates more than three or four times a week. In some of those workhouses it was not given so often. He was not now speaking of able-bodied paupers, whom it would not be desirable to indulge within the walls of workhouses; but he was referring to aged and infirm persons who had spent an honest life without spot or blemish. Again, to compare the diet of prisoners with that of the operatives of Lancashire, he doubted very much whether during the greater part of this winter the amount of money which reached the hands of those operatives enabled them to have meat six or seven times a week. Then, to take the case of the class from which those prisoners were principally drawn, 44 per cent of them came from the labouring class or persons connected with it. It was a rare thing for farm labourers to have meat more than once a week, yet here felons, some of whom had committed the most dreadful outrages, were being fed far in excess of them. It might be said that it was necessary to feed these men in order to enable them to do the work. But he did not believe that they ever got through the work which was set down for them, for there were very few prisons in which the work ever appeared in any tangible form. Again, it was argued, that if you cut down the dietary too low, the depressing influences of a prison would show themselves, and the vital energies of the prisoners would be so reduced that when released they would be unable to gain their livelihood. Now, he was not in favour of a starvation diet, but there was a practical point which might be reached between a starvation diet on the one hand and an excessively liberal diet on the other. He came now to the question of cells, and the influence which ought thus to be exercised over the minds of the prisoners. A prison cell, when surrounded by all the comforts of good clothing, warmth, and light, combined with high diet, really became at certain times of the year an object of desire as affording a comfortable domicile, especially to one of the nomad classes so often found in our assize courts. He had often heard prisoners express their gratitude to the Judges for sending them to gaol, and during the winter months of the year he had been positively thanked for doing the same thing. The Chaplain of the Northampton Borough Gaol expressed in his report his belief that the system of discipline as carried out there was not calculated to deter prisoners from crime, because "the daily attention to their wants and comforts is superior to what the generality of them obtain elsewhere." Looking at the bias which most chaplains had with respect to prison discipline, he did think that such testimony as this carried with it very great weight. As to the separation which was attempted, it was not a separation from all society, but only between prisoner and prisoner; and unless even this system were very strictly carried out, it was impossible to work it properly. He did not mean to say that in some cases the prisoners might not be separated, but he doubted very much whether there was a single gaoler throughout the country who in his conscience could say that under the existing system no communication passed between prisoner and prisoner. He doubted whether the construction of the gaols or the system allowed of it. At exercise or at chapel some communication must go on; but, setting these opportunities aside, the employment of prisoners upon garden or agricultural work, or as bricklayers, necessarily brought them into association, and then communications passed, which were often subversive of all discipline. Again, some prisoners were so hardened in crime that it was impossible to keep them in complete order without a system of prison punishments. On the other hand, gaol chaplains and inspectors set their faces against such punishments, and denounced them as a proof of mismanagement in any gaol where they prevailed. The consequence was, that there was a disinclination on the part of the visiting justices and the executive staff of prisons to notice or to punish offences committed there. This was not mere assertion on his part, because complete evidence was supplied in the last criminal returns. For several years past there had been a rapid decrease in prison punishments, and in one particular branch of punishments that decrease had been most extraordinary. Thus, in Reading Gaols the dark cells had been altogether shut up; and in 1859-60 it was computed that 1 in every 1,000 prisoners underwent corporal punishment, in the following year it was 1 in 1,500, and in the last year of which we had any returns the proportion was 1 in 2,240—a positive decrease of 75 per cent. At this result he was not surprised, because Prison Inspectors had recommended that corporal punishment should cease, and had triumphed over its disuse. Moreover, the whole course of Parliamentary legislation had been to throw every difficulty in the way of sentencing prisoners to corporal punishment. He was no advocate for an indiscriminate system of corporal punishment; nothing could be more revolting to the public sense, and nothing could tend more to brutalize prisoners. But there were certain cases in which he believed that corporal punishment was the only effectual remedy—for example, persons convicted over and over again of violent assaults, approaching to the verge of murder, would shrink from such punishment more than from any other; while in the case of juvenile offenders whipping would be the most merciful and at the same time the most efficacious punishment which could be inflicted. Another point of importance was one to which he had already alluded—the present extent of variation between the systems of different prisons. Thus, in some the labour system was based upon association, in others upon separation, and elsewhere, again, the mixed system was employed. The treadmill was resorted to in some, in others, cranks, pumps, and oakum picking; in some there was no labour at all, while others seemed to be a sort of industrial school, and the prisoners were set to work as tailors, shoemakers, carpenters, tinmen, matmakers, weavers, and so forth. In some 56 steps on the wheel were required per minute; in others, 30 steps. In some the crank made 14,000 revolutions, in others 6,000. There was no uniformity in speed or in the construction of machines. As to the dietaries, some were higher, some lower than the Government scale. In some there were three meals, in some only two a day. Some had only one scale for all prisoners, whether committed for a few days or for months. In some the prisoners had the same diet every day; in others they had a variety of food, as at Wakefield, where they received pudding, treacle, and Irish stew. In some the cells were warmed and lit; in others they were not. In some the prisoners were allowed to sleep for twelve or fourteen hours; in some only seven or eight. In some there was association in chapel; in others there was not. In respect of the charge of prisoners, the cost varied from £87 4s. 7d. in Oakham county gaol to £16 4s. 2d. in that of Kingston-on-Hull, and was £59 0s. 7d. and £18 3s. in Poole and Barnstaple gaols respectively—two borough gaols receiving the same number of prisoners, and generally resembling each other. In respect of the produce of prisoners' labour, in Coldbath Fields prison the actual produce was £1,901, and the estimated value of earnings £4,300, while in Abingdon Gaol the produce was only £2 1s. 7d. Those variances must lead to mischief to prisoners on account of the uncertainty of their sentences, and be injurious to the administration of justice, inasmuch as the sentences pronounced carried greater weight in some counties than in others. In conclusion, he would say a few words as to that which should govern prisons and prisoners—the principle upon which punishment was awarded. He dismissed altogether all fanciful theories—the idea of punishment for punishment's sake, as well as the humanitarian idea which made the moral reformation of the prisoner the be-all and the end-all of prison life. He accepted the views which he found were held by most of Her Majesty's Judges and by the great majority of reasonable people in this country, who had heads to be broken, lives to lose, or property to be stolen. The late Lord Denman, when examined before the Criminal Law Commission in 1850, said—

mode of administering the criminal law as to encourage instead of deterring."

A noble Lord, now in the House, but then Mr. Baron Parke, expressed himself in the following terms, in which Mr. Justice Patteson concurred—

"The principal object of punishment I take to be the protection of society, by deterring the offender from the repetition of the crime, and others from following his example, by the pain and inconvenience he sustains."

Another learned Judge, the late Mr. Baron Alderson, also said—

"I believe that the humanity which inflicts a slight punishment for the first offence, and for which so many people obtain a great reputation for tender-heartedness, is real inhumanity."

By the opinions of these learned and experienced Judges, he was justified in holding that the leading principle of punishment was to make it such as would be deterring to the prisoner and to others. He did not mean to say that he would exclude all idea of moral reformation; but that was a contingency beyond the power of human calculation, and ought never to be allowed to override the real object of punishment—it should be secondary and subordinate to it. In short sentences, even by the confession of the advocates of moral reformation, it was perfectly idle to put in operation all the elaborate machinery provided in gaols for the instruction and reformation of prisoners. He would not trespass further upon their Lordships' patience; but as the subject was one of great importance, yet one into which the Royal Commission was not instructed to inquire, he felt it his duty to press it upon the attention of the Government, who, he trusted, would give it their fullest consideration.

EARL GRANVILLE:—My Lords, the noble Earl has made a very clear statement upon what is one of the most difficult and intricate of social problems, and which, at this moment, is attracting a great deal of public attention; and therefore, I think, few subjects could be more interesting to your Lordships than that which the noble Earl has brought before us. I will not follow the noble Earl into the details of his speech or the statistics of crime which he has quoted, as they form a subject with which the Commission will have to deal. With respect to gaols, the noble Earl has, I think, divided the subject into four heads. The first is that of hard labour, which is one of the most important elements of punishment. He said—what I think is true—that in several prisons hard labour does not serve the purpose for which it was intended. If I am not mistaken in respect of one of the principal gaols in the county with which the noble Earl is connected, the last report of the Inspector pointed out the inadequacy of the labour there. The noble Earl, I am sure, is not to blame for that, for in a speech he made at the beginning of the year he himself called attention to this matter. But there are great differences of opinion on the question of labour. With many men hard labour, when not carried beyond a certain point, and not exceeding their physical ability to perform, is a positive relief rather than an addition to the punishment. There is a difference of opinion as to the kind of labour that should be given—whether, if you make the work unproductive, hard labour is not more distasteful to prisoners than when they understand some results will flow from it. Then we cannot altogether leave out of view the desirability of reforming prisoners. As to diet, the noble Earl thinks it is too good. Without any personal knowledge upon these points, I think the probability is greatly in favour of the view that the whole system in county gaols is too lenient. And this is not surprising. For the last twenty years public attention has been directed to this subject, and pressure has been put upon Parliament and magistrates and visiting justices in quite an opposite direction to undue severity. It is almost impossible that, under this pressure, the practical result should not be, upon the whole, that too much attention has been paid to the comfort of prisoners, and not sufficient to the deterring effects of the imprisonment. At the same time, the question of diet is one of great difficulty. Some years since, when the dietary was lowered, the late Sir Benjamin Brodie, who was not a man to allow himself to be governed by mere sentimental feelings, gave an opinion that the effect upon the health of the prisoners would be serious; and therefore it became impossible to abstain from increasing the dietary scale. The noble Earl referred to the different treatment of criminals and paupers, and said that the former received two-fifths more food than the latter. There is no doubt, however, that the effect of prison life is of a depressing character even under the most lenient system of discipline, and that it does require more animal food to prevent men from falling into a bad state of health, which we are not justified in inflicting upon them in addition to the punishment awarded. The noble Earl spoke of the eagerness shown by some prisoners, tried before magistrates, to return to prison, and said they frequently thanked the Judges for sentencing them. Although there may be some instances of that kind, yet, I think, in the great majority of cases, it is a little bit of bravado when the prisoner finds it impossible to avoid punishment, and then, to use a vulgar phrase, indulges himself by "chaffing" the Judge. I believe, even in the prisons to which the noble Earl has alluded, where the greatest leniency prevails, few prisoners would esteem it a greater boon to be retained in prison than to be let out of it. The whole question is one of great importance. It is difficult to be guided otherwise than by medical opinion in order not to expose prisoners to the danger of wasting by low fever. Men who live in bad circumstances, whose minds like their bodies may be said to be unsound—when such men come into prison, the common principles of humanity must induce us not to expose them to any influences detrimental to their mental or physical faculties. What you have to do is to make punishment deterrent, so that the prisoner, when he leaves the gaol, may be led to tell those who have been associated with him how bitter a thing it is to commit crime. With regard to the question of warming and ventilation, that also is a matter of very great difficulty. If you had the prisoners all in the same physical condition, and all of the same age, it would be very easily regulated. But the prisoners are not in the same condition, and the question of warmth and ventilation is precisely in the same position as that of food, the object being to keep them all in a proper state of health. When the prisoners are young and strong, an uncomfortable degree of cold, though unpleasant, would not injure them; while the same degree of cold would have most prejudicial effects on older and weaker constitutions. Then, with regard to communication, the great object should no doubt be, both in and out of prison, to dissociate prisoners from those with whom they were formerly in the habit of consorting, from whom they have acquired their worst habits, and with whom they naturally wish again to associate. That is in itself a great punishment. I think, while entirely agreeing that the real principle of punishment is that it should be deterrent, it is impossible not to see that it is necessary, as far as you can, to reform prisoners. You cannot keep them in the same state; if you do not make them better, you may be perfectly sure that they will become worse when they get out. You cannot hang them all, you cannot sentence them all to imprisonment for life; the time must come when they must be thrown again on society; and if you possibly can, you ought to improve their state of mind and industrious habits. Your Lordships must be aware that the Government powers are very limited in the matter of the discipline of gaols. They chiefly apply to the construction of new gaols, the certifying of the rules of county magistrates, and employing Inspectors and giving publicity to their reports; but there is no power of action on the part of the Government. It is very difficult to see how you can secure perfect consistency in the conduct of all prisons locally managed excepting by strengthening somewhat the central power—and that is a matter that ought to be gravely considered before the question is raised. It might be desirable to have a Committee of this House on the subject of the discipline of gaols, entirely confining the inquiry to that part of the subject, and without trenching on the duties of the Commission. The House is not overburdened with work at present, and the inquiry might lead to some useful recommendations.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he could attest the accuracy of the statements which had been made by his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon). The noble Earl the President of the Council appeared to think that his noble Friend was in error when he stated that in some cases the expense of prisoners exceeded very much that of paupers in regard to diet.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had guarded himself carefully from making a positive statement on the subject.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that the noble Earl had seemed to doubt the accuracy of the statement. Now, living as he did in the same county with his noble Friend, he could bear witness to the fact. The pauper was a great deal worse off with regard to diet and treatment than the occupant of the county gaol. The outdoor pauper, from age and illness, received 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. a week, while the prisoner in gaol was kept for not less than from 10s. to 12s. The criminal was therefore either in a much better state than the pauper, or the money was very badly expended. The effect of such comparisons on the lower classes—and they were constantly making them—was very unfortunate. It was by no means unusual to hear the observation, “It is better to be in Winchester Gaol than to have an outdoor allowance from such and such a parish.” It had been frequently stated that both soldiers and sailors had less meat and other allowances than prisoners in some of the gaols in the country. In the case of one particular gaol in Ireland, it was clearly made out that a prisoner, who was a soldier, had more meat and more luxuries than the soldiers of the regiment to which he belonged. This fact was not only important in itself, but in a moral point of view, because the classes from which criminals generally came made those comparisons, and the effect on their minds must be extremely bad when they saw men who had committed the greatest crimes (not having been executed) actually in a better situation than those who had passed a long life of labour and honesty, or those serving Her Majesty in the army and navy. Such comparisons at once shocked the common mind, and took away all the terrors that ought to attach to the commission of crime. There were two things of which the criminal class ought to be completely convinced—that punishment was certain to follow conviction, and that the sentence awarded by the Judge would be immutable; instead of which, their feeling was that they might avoid detection and escape punishment altogether, and if convicted and sentenced by the Judge, that sentence would not be carried out.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he had been much struck by the manner in which the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had—quite unintentionally, he was sure—misled their Lordships by the statistics he had read. It was quite true, no doubt, that the criminal statistics for 1861 showed a considerable increase in crime over those of 1860; but in dealing with statistics they must not look to the figures of any one year. They must look to an average of years to draw a correct conclusion. Although there was a large increase in 1861 over 1860, yet in 1860 there was a decrease as compared with 1859 and as far back as 1857. In 1857 the commitments were 20,259, and in 1861 the commitments were 18,226. He would refer their Lordships to a Return of commitments for periods of five years. In the period from 1847 to 1851 there were 142,771 commitments; in the next five years, from 1852 to 1856, there were 129,335; and in the last five years, 89,123. So that, comparing these periods together, there had been a continued decrease in the number of commitments. He was not about to draw a conclusion in favour of all the details of our present prison system from that. On the contrary, he agreed for the most part in what the noble Earl opposite had so well stated on that subject; but he wished to point out the fallacy of inferring, because the statistics of crime for 1861 exceeded those of 1860—and he feared those for 1862 would show a further increase—that our system of penal discipline was altogether a failure. There had been several disturbing causes at work, such as the question of the treatment of convicts, the general condition of the country, and the like. He agreed with very much of what the noble Earl had stated—he agreed that there were great defects, such as the variety of punishment that exists in various parts of the country. It seemed to him that the great defect in our present system was its want of uniformity, so that it was a mere chance what kind of imprisonment a prisoner got. When criminals were sent to one part of the country, they were subjected to one kind of imprisonment; and if sent to another part of the country, to imprisonment of quite a different kind. He believed, however, that the main principles on which our prison system rested were sound. Those principles were the separation of the prisoners and the infliction of hard labour. The system of classification had been abandoned because it implied association, and the system of separation had been found far more efficient. By separation he meant their confinement, except during the hours of labour, in separate cells. That principle was carried out in our best-regulated prisons, where also care was taken, when the prisoners were at labour, that they should not communicate with each other. The noble Earl opposite said there was no prison in the country where the prisoners did not communicate; but, unless they were to be so rigorously shut up in their cells as never to be able to see each other at all, it was impossible to prevent their communicating with each other sometimes. The only thing that could be done was by setting them to work in separate boxes, with the officers of the prison watching over them, to make communication between them as difficult and infrequent as possible. He thought that sufficient provision was not made in many instances for the infliction of hard labour. He was now speaking of county prisons, where criminals were confined for brief periods, and where it was desired to make the imprisonment sharp but short. His own opinion was that the old-fashion instrument, the treadmill, was an exceedingly wholesome engine of punishment; and he might mention that the treadmill really implied hard labour. In the gaol with the management of which he was himself best acquainted, the prisoners were put upon the treadmill, and made to ascend 960 steps in half an hour. If any of their Lordships would only think of what it was to walk up that number of steps in that time, and to continue it, with intervals of ten minutes, for ten hours a day, they would see that it was no misnomer to call that hard labour. It had been said that it was very improper to employ prisoners on labour which was unproductive; but it should be borne in mind that the object of imprisoning these men was not that they should perform productive labour, but to deter from the commission of crime; and if we sacrificed the deterrent principle to the theory that the labour done by criminals should be productive, we altogether mistook the rule by which we should be guided. If it happened that the work could be properly made productive—for instance, in pumping water for the prison—it should be so used; but that incident did not seem to him to be essential. In well-regulated prisons, the best-behaved prisoners were taken from the treadmill and placed upon some industrial employment, and in the event of misconduct they were again sent to the treadmill, because some gradation of punishment was absolutely necessary in order to maintain discipline. Another point which merited great attention was the prison diet. There was no question on which it was more difficult to form a correct opinion. Any one who examined the scale of prison rations could hardly help asking the question why men condemned for criminal offences should receive food which was not only superior to that given to the poor in our workhouses, but far better than the agricultural peasant could earn by honest labour. The answer usually obtained from the medical officers or the directors of prisons was, that it was impossible these men could be kept in health unless they received as nutritious a diet as that now prescribed for them. In the face of that assertion, made on such authority, it was exceedingly difficult for the managers of gaols to lower the rations. Moreover, it was stated that where they had been lowered a great increase of ill-health ensued, and therefore, instead of their being able to enforce the reduced diet, they had to give to prisoners such constant indulgences as broke down proper discipline. At the same time, whilst he thought that the quantity of provisions should be sufficient, when he found that a prisoner had every morning a pint of cocoa with molasses or sugar to sweeten it, he could not help thinking that some kind of gruel, sufficiently nutritious, but not quite so palatable, might be substituted for it. The regulations of the Home Office were, he must say, exceedingly liberal on this head. They prescribed for each prisoner's dinner a pint of soup, so much meat without bone, so much potatoes, with pepper and salt as condiments, and a certain quantity of pease-pudding; the whole forming a kind of mess, which if any one of their Lordships only tasted, they would pronounce to be uncommonly good. Certainly a man sentenced to four months' hard labour could not well complain of his diet. What he might complain of was what a prisoner once complained of to him. Two complaints were made. One was, that he was too much watched; the other was, that he did not think he got his share of the best bits. In his opinion, the complaints showed how excellent was the prison diet, and how little onerous was the prison discipline. He thought the table of diet might be revised so as to make it of a less savoury and agreeable kind, but at the same time they must take care that it was sufficiently nutritious to keep the prisoners in health. The general principles of the separate system were sound, but some further power should be given to the Home Office, by means of the Inspectors, to see that the prisons were so constructed and so managed that something like a uniform practice should be enforced. If that were done, he believed they would, do all they possibly could for the repression of crime.

LORD WENSLEYDALE thought their Lordships were greatly indebted to the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) for the very clear, luminous, and satisfactory explanation of the subject which he had given to-night. He thought, for himself, that prisoners were allowed more animal food than was necessary for them. Two years ago he visited one of two gaols in Prussia which were conducted on the model of Pentonville, and he found that each prisoner had 1½ lb. of bread per diem, and only 2 lb. of meat in the course of the year. Meat was given only on four days in the year; and, judging from the appearance of the prisoners, they were, as the physician stated, in perfectly good health.

LORD TRURO said, that one reason why a better diet than would otherwise be allowable was necessary, arose from the circumstance that prisoners on entering prison were deprived of ardent spirits and therefore required an extra amount of food.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he believed that most of the facts could be ascertained by a careful inspection of the Reports which had been made to Parliament; and though he advised his noble Friend to accept the offer of a Committee, he did not think it need involve a protracted inquiry, as it would be quite sufficient to examine the Inspectors of Prisons and to refer to their reports. As to dietary, it seemed, from a paper he had in his hands, that in the City of London Union the inmates had 174 ounces of solid food in a week, whilst in the Middlesex House of Correction the allowance was 196 ounces; showing a great difference in favour of the prison, though whether rightly or wrongly he would not then consider. He thought that his noble Friend would do well to accept the offer of the Government to grant a Committee.

EARL CATHCART said, there was a good reason for giving extra diet in prison. The first effect of confinement within four walls was to reduce the amount of vital power; and unless it were immediately made up, the prisoner would fall into a low state, and become liable to serious disease. Surgeons were men of science and intelligence, and in such a case they would say, "Why should I pour my doctor's stuff down the man's throat, when I know that if I order him a basin of broth I shall do him more good?" The visiting justices in his county, at Northallerton, had a long discussion upon hard labour and diet. As soon as he got home, he saw some men digging a drain twenty feet deep. They were turning the soil to a stage, and from the stage to the surface. It was the hardest work they could possibly conceive. The lowest man was exceedingly strong and powerful; but if he were put to do the same work in prison, and had only the same diet, he would die. He hoped that a full inquiry would be made into the subject.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in reply, said, he had guarded himself expressly against associating in the relation of cause and effect the increase of crime in the particular year he had referred to with prison discipline. He would accept the offer of the noble Earl for the appointment of a Committee. He hoped some Member of the Government would consent to serve on it, and that he should receive from them all possible assistance. He would move the appointment of the Select Committee to-morrow evening.

THE EARL OF DUDLEY said, he desired to ask the Government whether they would consent to refuse in all cases of second convictions, involving a sentence of penal servitude, any remission of the time of such sentence. What he wished to see effected was an extension of the recent circular of the Secretary for the Home Department, so that not merely persons who had been sentenced for a second time to penal servitude, being at the time of such such second conviction out on a ticket of leave, but all persons who should be subjected to such a punishment after a previous conviction of any kind, should be debarred from the expectation of a remission of their sentence. He was afraid he should be met by the reply that the matter had been referred to a Royal Commission, but he could not see that that was any reason why the Home Office should refuse to carry further the circular they had recently issued by taking this step. The initiative had been taken by the Home Office; and as, rightly or wrongly, the whole country believed that the state of crime depended very much on the manner in which it administered the law, it was important to ascertain whether the Home Office was inclined to give the country some sort of assurance that it would do everything in its power to put an end to the state of things which had recently excited so much alarm. At present Judges knew that the sentences which they passed would not be carried out, and prisoners were equally aware that they would not actually suffer the punishment to which they had been condemned. He believed that the adoption of such a course as he suggested, by giving greater exactness to our system of legal punishment, would tend considerably to the diminution of crime.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it would be out of the question for the Executive to make further important changes without waiting for the Report of the Commission. To act on the suggestion of the noble Earl would be virtually to abolish tickets of leave.

THE EARL OF DERBY observed, that the question of the noble Earl (the Earl of Dudley) referred to second convictions.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was aware of that; but it referred to second convictions, even in cases in which the first sentence had not been one of penal servitude a portion of which had been remitted by ticket of leave. Now, there were very few persons sentenced to penal servitude who had not been previously sentenced for some minor offence. The circular issued by the Home Office to Judges and Chairmen of Quarter Sessions was intended to meet the case of persons who were re-committed after imprisonment under a sentence of penal servitude.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, February 19, 1863.

MINUTES.—NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Somerset (Western Division), William Henry Powell Gore Langton, esquire.

RESOLUTIONS IN COMMITTEE.—Prince of Wales (Queen's Message) [17th February]; Partnership Law Amendment.

PUBLIC BILLS.—First Reading.—Register of Voters [Bill 25]; Partnership Law Amendment [Bill 26].

Second Reading.—Corrupt Practices at Elections [Bill 8]; Union Relief Aid Act (1862) Continuance [Bill 17]; Telegraphs [Bill 16]; Malt Duty [Bill 20].

Committee.—Births and Deaths Registration (Ireland) [Bill 9]; Qualification for Offices Abolition [Bill 4].

Re-committed.—Illegitimate Children (Ireland) [Bill 13], in respect of Clause 4.

Report.—Illegitimate Children (Ireland) [Bill 13]; Qualification for Offices Abolition [Bill 4].
Considered as amended.—Drainage of Land (Ireland) [Bill 7].

THAMES CONSERVANCY BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he wished to take that occasion to protest against the Bill passing into law in the shape of a private measure, conferring, as it professed to do, such arbitrary and extensive powers on the Thames Conservancy Board. It proposed to interfere with the trade of the river from the Nore to Staines, and to tax certain parties who carried on business on the banks of the river. He thought a measure of that kind ought to be public and not private, and he would therefore move that it be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. W. WILLIAMS seconded the Motion. The House had the other evening given a check to private legislation by rejecting two measures of a similar nature, and he hoped they would follow the same course on that occasion. The Bill proposed to levy a tax on the inhabitants, and that ought not to be done by such a measure introduced in a private manner. The President of the Board of Trade, or the Government, ought to undertake the supervision of such a Bill, and not leave it in the hands of two private Members.

MR. NORRIS said, he should support the second reading. The Bill was not a taxing one, but simply for the purpose of enabling the conservators of the Thames to alter the licence tax charged on each journey a boat plied or travelled on the Thames to a tax on the passengers. The Bill was further to enable the conservators to take care of the health of the inhabitants of the metropolis, by preventing barge-men and others emptying filthy matter into the river, and he hoped the house would send it before a Select Committee.

MR. TITE contended that the Bill ought to be proceeded with, as anything which Captain Birchell and the other conservators of the Thames proposed to do was worthy of the consideration of the House. He thought the Bill was anything but objectionable in principle, and that if enacted into a law, it would tend to prevent the pollution of the river.

MR. LOCKE observed, that he should oppose the second reading, on the ground that the conduct of the conservators was extremely arbitrary and unconstitutional.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he had given great attention to the provisions of the measure, and to the arguments advanced both for and against it, and he had come to the conclusion that it ought to be rejected. His opinion was, that the whole matter of the Thames conservancy, which affected the greatest commercial interests of the City of London, ought to be referred to a Select Committee for a full and rigid inquiry. He entreated hon. Members to lend their assistance in throwing out the Bill.

MR. MASSEY said, he was inclined to think that some inquiry was needed into the manner in which the Conservancy Board had discharged their duties; but that was no reason why the House should not give them the powers which they said were essential to the discharge of their functions. He recommended that the Bill should be read a second time.

MR. ALDERMAN SIDNEY said, his objection to the Bill was, that it sought to disturb the compromise which was come to in the year 1857, and referred to matters which ought to be dealt with by a public measure. It proposed to remove the Lord Mayor from the presidency of the Board, and to substitute a paid chairman.

MR. ANGERSTEIN said, he should vote against the Bill on similar grounds.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the Chairman of Committees had placed the House in some difficulty. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think an inquiry absolutely necessary, and at the same time said that the Bill had nothing to do with the conduct of the Board. Now he (Mr. Henley) thought it had everything to do with the Board, inasmuch as it proposed to give it more powers—he believed more taxing powers. He thought that the inquiry should precede, not follow, the granting of those powers. That appeared to him to be the wiser course.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Mr. Tite

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

METROPOLITAN BRIDGES AND RAILWAYS.—QUESTION.

MR. TITE said, he rose to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is the intention of Government to institute any inquiry into the nature of the various Railway projects which propose to intersect the Metropolis, or to subject to any control the architectural character and construction of Bridges crossing the River Thames, or the streets and roads which are interfered with?

MR. COWPER in reply said, that some of the great railways which brought travellers into the heart of the metropolis had been carried out at a sacrifice of appearance, and to the great disfigurement of several of our principal thoroughfares. The approach to London Bridge, which used to be handsome, was now intercepted by a huge mass of iron winding above the heads of persons on the level of the roadway, and obscuring St. Saviour's Church. The same disregard of beauty was seen in the bridges recently erected, and especially Lambeth Bridge, which, though doubtless very economical and convenient, was, in his (Mr. Cowper's) opinion, constructed in a manner unnecessarily plain, rude, and ugly. As regarded inquiries by the Government, he would beg to refer the hon. Member to the Report of the Board of Trade, which had been laid on the table of the House. The questions relating to the architectural character and construction of metropolitan works could not be in better hands than in those of the hon. Gentleman himself, whose eminence in his profession, and position as President of the Institute of British Architects, would give great weight to any suggestions which he might make. He also thought it very likely that Members representing the metropolis would be prepared with some proposal on the subject.

ARRANGEMENT OF THE CIRCUITS.

QUESTION.

MR. M'MAHON said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether Her Majesty's Government proposes to bring in, and, if so, when, a measure for re-arranging any other Circuit beside the Northern, and for holding an Assize for civil business in other counties beside Lancashire, and for removing the inconvenience of accumulating country causes for trial in London and Middlesex, and for so arranging the town sittings as not to interfere with Circuits?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL replied that the state of the Northern Circuit and of other Circuits was under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, with a view to effect such rearrangement as might seem to be expedient. But, whether a measure on the subject would or would not be introduced into Parliament depended on the nature of the proposed change; for, as his hon. and learned Friend well knew, the powers capable of being exercised by an Order in Council, without the intervention of Parliament, were very extensive. There was no present intention of holding a third Assize for civil business in any county where one was not already held; and there was no such measures in contemplation as was referred to in the last part of the hon. and learned Member's question.

PHOENIX PARK (DUBLIN).—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If a detailed survey and examination of the Phoenix Park, Dublin, has been made by the Commissioners of Public Works; if any Report as to the condition of the Park has been made by them; and if he will lay such Report upon the table of the House?

MR. PEEL, in reply, said, a Report of the nature referred to by the hon. Member had been received from the Board of Works, and various improvements and new works, such as draining and replanting the Park, had been suggested. Those suggestions had been adopted, and provision for part of the necessary outlay would be made in the Estimates. There was no objection to lay the Report on the table, but the Estimates would contain all the necessary information.

SPIRIT DUTIES.—QUESTION.

MR. STANSFELD said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is at liberty to state the intentions of the Government in reference to the Spirit Duties, and whether any alteration in their amount is contemplated?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the subject to which the hon. Member had alluded was of such importance both to the revenue and to the trade that last year he had departed from the usual practice, by stating the course he intended to adopt with regard to the Spirit Duties at a period when the financial arrangements for the year were not yet under consideration. For the same reasons he was quite willing to reply to the question just put. Her Majesty's Government decidedly did not intend to propose any change in the Spirit Duties now payable by law.

PRINCE OF WALES (QUEEN'S MESSAGE).

Queen's Message [17th February],—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I rise, Sir, to propose to the Committee Resolutions for the purpose of providing, in the words of the Message, "an establishment for the Prince and Princess of Wales suitable to the rank and dignity of their station." In doing so I would remind the House of the happiness which we enjoy by living under a constitutional Monarchy. The people of this country not only are now more than at any former period sensible by positive experience of the blessings which that form of Government confers, but they have also an opportunity of appreciating its value by contrasting it with events which are passing in other parts of the world. We see in the East some of the evils which are incident to arbitrary sway. We witness in the West the widespread misery and desolation which are sometimes created by democratic and Republican institutions. We enjoy a happy medium between the extremes of these two forms of Government. Our institutions not only confer happiness and tranquillity upon the people of these realms, but enable them to enjoy the most perfect freedom of thought, of speech, of writing, and of action, unawed and uncontrolled either by the edicts of despotic authority, or by the Lynch law of an ungovernable mob. Well, Sir, I trust that the people of this nation will long continue to enjoy those advantages, and that their hearts will be turned to the Almighty Dispenser of events with thankfulness—with reverential thankfulness for the lot which has thus been assigned them, and I am persuaded that their bosoms will be full of the most affectionate attachment towards that Sovereign and family under whose mild and beneficent sway, humanly speaking, those blessings have been conferred. Sir, there are occasions in the course of human affairs in which events that are matters of joy and rejoicing produce pleasure that begins and ends with the occasion on which it arises; but there are other occasions where joyful events link and connect the present with the future—when the happiness which mankind enjoys at the moment is an earnest and a security for happiness in the future. Such an occasion is the present, when the Heir Apparent to the Crown is going to contract a marriage which will, I trust, not only be productive of domestic happiness to the family in the midst of which it is to be celebrated, but holds out to this country a prospect of a long line of succeeding Sovereigns, who by virtue of transmitted qualities and of the recollection of the conduct of those who went before them, will imitate the virtues of the stock from which they spring, and will contribute as much as the present family do to the happiness, the welfare, and the dignity of the country over which they rule. Sir, the people of this country have always been disposed readily to give whatever may be necessary to maintain the due dignity which is essential to our monarchical institutions, and I am persuaded that upon the present occasion the proposal which it will be my duty to make will be acceded to with readiness and pleasure by this House, and will be sanctioned by the country. In considering, Sir, that which it may be fitting upon the present occasion to grant to the Crown for the establishment of the Prince and Princess of Wales, it is right to look back a little, and see what has been done upon similar occasions in times gone by. Now, if hon. Gentlemen will look to the speech of Mr. Pitt, when in 1795 he proposed an establishment for the then Prince and Princess of Wales, they will see he stated that the Prince of Wales in 1745, and the Prince of Wales, at an earlier period, in 1715, had each of them a net income of £100,000 a year, in one case in addition to the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall. It is not quite clear, from the words made use of, whether in both cases that income was in addition to the £100,000. I rather infer that it was. Now, everybody is aware what a great change has taken place in the value of money since either of those remote periods, and how little a sum of the same nominal amount represents in the present day the command of things which it did either in 1745 or 1715. Coming down to a later period, in 1795, when Mr. Pitt proposed and the House assented to an establishment for the then Prince and Princess of Wales, the arrangement was not a simple one, because it was complicated by another for the payment of the large debts at that time due by his Royal Highness the then Prince of Wales. But the total amount of allowance which was granted, including that portion which was set aside for the liquidation of the Prince's debts, was £138,000, charged partly upon the Civil List, and partly upon the Consolidated Fund; and although for a certain number of years the appropriation of a large portion of the amount to the payment of debts reduced the available income of the then Prince of Wales to something, I believe, between £60,000 and £70,000, yet I apprehend that about the year 1806, the debts having been liquidated, the Prince of Wales entered into the receipt of the £138,000. Now, it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government, nor is it the desire of Her Majesty, that the present appropriation by Parliament should be founded upon what was then proposed for the Prince of Wales. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is in the enjoyment of the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall; and to the honour of Her Majesty and of the late Prince Consort be it said that whereas in former reigns it was understood, and the practice was, that during the minority of the Prince of Wales the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall were added to the available income of the Crown, in the present reign those revenues have been carefully and studiously set apart to accumulate for the benefit of the Prince of Wales till he came of age. The funds thus accumulated are very considerable—part of them have been invested in the purchase of a landed estate in the county of Norfolk, which cost, I believe, about £220,000, the nominal rental being £7,000 a year—but it may be that there will be deductions, as hon. Gentlemen will well understand, and there may not be more than £5,000 available income. Part of the accumulations must be set aside for the outfit of the Prince of Wales and to form an establishment, and part also will be required for the purpose of building upon the Norfolk estate a mansion more suitable than the present one to the dignity and station of its new occupants. Making these deductions, the details of which I will not trouble the House to go into, the probable income of the Duchy of Cornwall, together with the income arising from the investment I have mentioned, and from the remaining accumulations, may be taken in round numbers at about £60,000 a year. Well, we think that a sum of £100,000 a year would not be disproportionate to those expenses which must fall upon a person in the exalted position of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and I shall therefore have to propose to the House to grant £40,000 a year out of the Consolidated Fund for the establishment of the Prince of Wales. Such of those whom I am now addressing, and who, fortunately for them, are not in the single and bachelor state, well know that there are expenses which the Princess of Wales must incur, and which require that she should have a separate and sufficient income; and by the treaty of marriage recently concluded between Her Majesty and the King of Denmark the allowance undertaken to be secured to Her Royal Highness was £10,000 a year for her own separate use. The grant, therefore, which I shall to-night have to ask the Committee to assent to will be one of £50,000 a year; namely, £40,000 for the aggregate establishment, and £10,000 for the separate use of the Princess.

I should explain that up to the time when the Duchy of Cornwall was managed under the Commission at which the late Prince Consort presided, it was, in former times, the custom of the Duchy to grant long leases, or life leases, at a reduced rent on payment of heavy fines, and these fines formed a material element in the annual income of the Duke of Cornwall. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is quite sensible that this is not a proper mode of management, and is willing that an Act should be passed restraining him from granting such leases in future, and directing that the Duchy property should be managed in the usual way in which property is generally managed, not allowing the occupier in possession to take advantage of fines on renewals in granting leases, to the detriment of those who may follow him. I am told by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) that such an Act is in actual preparation, and will be without delay submitted to the consideration of the House. Hon. Members will naturally be desirous of becoming acquainted with more ample information than it would be proper for me to detail on the present occasion respecting the condition of the Duchy and the state of its present revenues and prospects. On this subject there is a Report—a very accurate account in detail—which I shall have to lay on the table this evening, and which will be in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow or on the following day. That Report will give the fullest information with respect to all those details of the Duchy which hon. Members may wish to know. There is now only one point which I have to add to what I have already stated. There, of course, must be provision made for a jointure to be given to the Princess of Wales in the event of the Princess surviving her husband. In the case of the Princess of Wales, the wife of George IV., the jointure was fixed at £50,000. We do not propose that in the present instance it should be to so high an amount. We think that £30,000 a year will be a sufficient amount; and therefore, though the allowance to the late Princess of Wales, during the joint lives of herself and her husband, was less than the amount stipulated for the present Princess, yet, putting one thing against the other, though the present allowance is greater, and I think not greater than it ought to be, the jointure will nevertheless be reduced to the amount I have named. I am not aware that I have anything to add to what I have already stated, and I now move the first Resolution.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he considered the proposition of the noble Lord to be moderate and reasonable, except that the information as to the Duchy of Cornwall on which the Vote was founded was not on the table of the House. They were placed in considerable difficulty in dealing with the matter, because the whole question turned upon the condition of the finances of the Duchy of Cornwall. A promise had been made the other night that the fullest information would be given; but, in the absence of that information, they were called upon to agree to a Resolution. It appeared that £700,000 or more had been received from the Duchy in the course of the minority and that during the last twelve years £460,000 had been received as net revenue. He did not object to the allowance of £100,000 a year—that was a fair and reasonable charge, but, he repeated, the Committee was not in a position to form a judgment as to the charge to be made upon the Consolidated Fund until they had seen the accounts. He did not quite agree in the historical account given by the noble Viscount, because he did not believe that Frederick Prince of Wales, in 1737, had £100,000. He believed that the allowance on that occasion was £50,000 a year, and that it was not till some years had elapsed, and His Royal Highness had a family grown up, that he had £100,000 a year.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he was not disposed to object to the proposition; but he trusted, that in addition to the Report promised by the noble Lord, there would be laid before the House a full account of the accumulation of funds effected during the minority.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he thought that the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall could, by good management, have been made to yield the whole of the required £100,000, without coming on the Consolidated Fund for £40,000. The Committee ought to remember that £16,000 a year had been regularly paid over to the Prince during his minority. Besides which, the nation had voted £20,000 for Marlborough House, £6,000 for stables attached to the house, £17,000 for the Duchy of Cornwall Office, an allowance even for making him a Knight of the Garter, and for the trip to Canada. In fact, there had been a variety of charges during the minority of his Royal Highness, which made the expenses incurred on his behalf by the country not less during that period than £20,000 a year, and there was still an overplus of between £600,000 and £700,000; and he therefore hoped that the Committee would pause before they determined on the proposed addition to his Royal Highness's income out of the Consolidated Fund. With that large sum available, and with the rising revenues of the Duchy, which could not be set down at less than between £40,000 and £50,000 a year, of which £16,000 was paid over regularly from the Consolidated Fund, and therefore without any expense to the Duchy, there ought to be a sufficient income. He was glad to hear that a Bill was to be introduced relating to the Duchy, because the necessity for it was shown by the fact that the expenses of management were about 20 per cent of the income, and that fact showed how expensive it was to provide for the Princes of the Royal family by landed estates. With regard to the dowry of the Princess of Wales, he thought it ought to be charged on the revenues of the Duchy, instead of on the Consolidated Fund. The revenues of the Duchy were so peculiar that he believed, on the death of a Prince of Wales, they would not go to a son, supposing he had one, but would revert to the Crown. It was quite clear that an additional revenue of £60,000 a year to the Sovereign would be altogether waste; and therefore he hoped the Government would consider whether it was not wise and just that the dower of the Princess of Wales should be settled on the revenues of the Duchy. ["Oh, oh!"] He wished to mention one or two other points. Was the Sandringham estate, which had been purchased out of the surplus accumulations of the revenues of the Duchy, to be regarded as the private property of the Prince of Wales, or was it to be settled in such a way that it should hereafter form part of the public estate? He was endeavouring to point out incidents connected with the settlement, so as to prevent the public being unfairly charged with expenditure which ought not to fall upon them. He reserved to himself the privilege of making some suggestions in future.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I was in hopes that the Resolution before us might have been passed unanimously and without debate. But, as it has led to some unexpected, and I must say unnecessary, discussion, I think it my duty to express what I believe is the feeling on this side of the House, and, as I can hardly doubt, of the House generally. We are of opinion that the proposition made by Her Majesty's Government is a temperate and, as we presume, well-considered proposition. We trust that it will be adequate—no one can say that it is excessive. What has struck me as not very reasonable in the observations of the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken is that they have brought forward the good management of the Duchy of Cornwall as a reason why we should not assent to this proposal. It appears to me that we ought to be thankful for the successful administration of the Duchy, and not make it an argument for reduction in the Vote proposed by Her Majesty's Ministers. It is very possible that the Duchy may be even better managed in the future than it has been in the past. It is very probable that the rents and revenues of the Duchy may with time increase in the same manner as the rents of almost every other estate throughout the land. But I do not believe the country is disposed to grudge to His Royal Highness the advantage of such increase. It is not at all impossible, with all his prudence and discretion, His Royal Highness may find the means of applying to a good use any increase that may occur. I hope the Committee will allow the Vote to pass, if not without a dissentient voice, at least without a dissentient Vote. If there are any points of detail in regard to the management of the Duchy on which any hon. Gentleman wishes to be informed and to offer his opinion, an opportunity will be afforded to him during the stages of the Bill which will be introduced to carry this Resolution into effect.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I wish to say on the part of Her Majesty's Government, that we admit the perfect fairness of the claim of the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) and others to reserve their own private judgment on the proposition which has been so favourably received by the Committee generally until they have had an opportunity of examining carefully the Report of the Council on the Duchy which my noble Friend is tonight to lay on the table. I fully concur in the spirit of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli). I think it is very desirable that the Committee should, as I do not doubt it will in the result, give a cheerful and undivided assent to this proposal. In order to prevent misunderstanding, it is necessary, however, that I should say a word or two of explanation on one or two points of detail. The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham has impeached the accuracy of my noble Friend's history, and said that Frederick Prince of Wales did not obtain the allowance of £100,000 per annum from the Civil List until a later period than the year named by my noble Friend. The noble Lord named 1745, and it does so happen that his history was in a very minute point open to impeachment, for instead of Frederick Prince of Wales obtaining that allowance later than that year, he obtained it earlier—it was granted in 1743. However, I am more anxious to advert to a point mentioned by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Augustus Smith). My hon. Friend holds that the jointure of the Princess of Wales ought to be charged upon the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall. That might be a point of moment for consideration were we in circumstances in which, while we had a Prince of Wales and a Duke of Cornwall, there was a likelihood of our being without one to follow; but looking to the state of the Royal Family, no such contingency is, happily, to be apprehended; and I conceive, that so long as you have a Prince of Wales and a Duke of Cornwall to provide for, it is immaterial to the public purse whether the jointure is taken out of the revenues of the Duchy in the first instance, which would leave so much more to be provided from the Consolidated Fund, or whether the more simple, and, I am bound to add, the usual course, is taken, and the jointure charged on the Consolidated Fund. It would be well for the Committee to understand that, of course, the moderate sum which has been named by my noble Friend as the jointure for the Princess of Wales, will be a jointure for her own establishment. It is obvious it is not a jointure out of which it would be possible for any Princess of Wales to defray the very considerable expenses which may be connected with the education of children, and which would form a very legitimate subject of reference to this House. My hon. Friend the Member for Truro was not entirely just in the observations he made with regard to the charges which, as he said, the Consolidated Fund had already had to bear on account of the Prince of Wales. It is quite true that we paid a large sum of money on account of Marlborough House. We had, however, value received. We had had the use of it for important public purposes, which would otherwise have cost a considerable sum of money during a number of years. We had taken great liberties with it; we had, in homely phrase, pulled it to pieces; and the sum the House voted was intended simply for the purpose of replacing Marlborough House in as good a condition as we had received it. Therefore, we are not in position to say that that sum was voted to the Prince of Wales. The Vote for the tour in Canada and the United States has been mentioned, but the House will recollect the grounds on which the sum was voted. It was not voted in aid of the personal expenses of the Prince of Wales, but for the purpose of curtailing the expenditure which was undertaken by the Prince of Wales, while a minor, on behalf of her Majesty, and for purposes strictly political; and I may venture to say, whether we regard the journey in Canada or in the United States, and the reception the Prince there met with, it was money well laid out, and it forms no part whatever of the question the Committee has to consider on the proposition of my noble Friend. One other point, with still less justice, was referred to. It was said that the Prince of Wales receives £16,000 a year from the Consolidated Fund. No doubt he does; but what is the History of it. It is a composition in lieu of revenues of which the Prince of Wales would otherwise have been in receipt as the Duke of Cornwall. There were certain tin duties which were deemed inconvenient and oppressive; his right to them was as unquestionable as if they constituted a landed estate. It was thought expedient for the public interest, with a view to the extension of commerce, and especially with a view to the benefit of that part of the country which my hon. Friend represents, that these duties should be abolished; and the Prince of Wales receive compensation, exactly as any other proprietor would have received it. If so, it is perfectly obvious a consideration of that kind cannot possibly enter into this discussion, because, to the full extent—nay, possibly to a greater extent, if that arrangement had not been made—he would have been receiving money on account of the tin duties to which he was entitled as the Duke of Cornwall. I am desirous of obviating the misapprehension that would prevail if it were supposed that that was a Vote in addition to the charge on the Consolidated Fund, whereas there is no foundation in fact for such a supposition.

MRS JOHN TRELAWNY said, he was surprised at the ignorance which prevailed on the Treasury bench with respect to some of the most important facts connected with the Duchy of Cornwall. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for example, seemed not to know what would become of the revenues of the Duchy on the death of the Prince of Wales. He recollected on a former occasion, when a settlement was made on the Princess Royal, assuring the Prime Minister that, according to the peculiar tenure of the Duchy, on the death of the eldest son of the Sovereign the property would revert to the Crown. On that occasion it was maintained that he was wrong, but it afterwards turned out that he was right, though no one in the House was aware of the fact he had stated except himself and his hon. Friend (Mr. Augustus Smith). But the point to which he wished to call attention was a passage in a celebrated speech delivered by Burke on economical Reform. Towards the end of that speech Burke proposed that the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster should be sold, and the proceeds handed over to the public exchequer. His object, no doubt, was to make the Crown dependent solely upon votes of Parliament for any sums of money it might require. The proposal of Mr. Burke might be carried out with advantage. There was plenty of room for improvement in the management of the Duchy property, which was spread over about ten or eleven counties. If the property were judiciously sold, the sales taking place at the right time, very large sums would be secured, and it would not be necessary for those who were in office, backed by those who expected to be in, to come forward with a proposal which would not be approved by the public out of doors. [Cries of No, no!] There was a time when the Conservatives were bold enough to propose the reduction of a grant of this sort, and he was sorry that hon. Gentlemen opposite were so ready to acquiesce in the present proposal, not allowing the public feeling to have any weight with them. He joined issue with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon another point—namely, that the duties formerly payable on tin in Cornwall could fairly be regarded as the property of the Duchy. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been in office when those duties were abolished, he would doubtless have said, "I am a Free-trader; I do not like duties on commodities; the tin duties in Cornwall ought to be abolished, because they are part of a bad system;" and, if consistent in his principles, he would have refused to give a charge of £16,000 upon the Consolidated Fund in lieu of them. But the right hon. Gentlemen now twitted Cornishmen as if they alone had benefited by the abolition of the tin duties, forgetting his own doctrine that such taxes were paid by the consumers as well as by the producers. It was not his intention, however, to throw an apple of discord into the Committee on that occasion, and therefore he would not further oppose the Resolutions proposed by the noble Lord the First Minister, but he could not help expressing his regret that more attention had not been paid to the feelings and wishes of the public out of doors.

MR. KENDALL said, that in former times there was a very onerous local tax which crushed the tanners of Cornwall, but upon their application to Parliament a compromise was made, by which the £16,000 was charged on the Consolidated Fund, and while Cornwall was relieved, the public generally were also benefited. Such being the case, he very much regretted that any Cornishman should have spoken against an arrangement for which the county felt deeply grateful.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE observed that his hon. Friend was somewhat unreasonable in complaining that the advice of Mr. Burke had not been taken. If that advice had been acted on in 1778, and the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster sold, Parliament would now have been called upon to provide the full amount of revenue which by common consent was necessary to maintain the dignity and station of the Prince of Wales. What was the case with respect to the Duchy of Cornwall? In the days of Burke the whole of the revenue was eaten up by those fastened upon the Duchy. He had been informed by a noble Lord, who had taken an active part in the management of the Duchy, that when the Council commenced their labours at the beginning of the present reign the net rental was no more than £12,000 a year, and that the expenses of management amounted to something like the same sum. By dint of good management, which formed another item in the debt of gratitude due to the memory of the Prince Consort, the income of the Duchy had been raised to £50,000 per annum, while the cost of management did not exceed between £7,000 and £8,000. That, he thought, was a sufficient reason why they ought to be glad that the advice of Mr. Burke was not followed by the Government of the day. But he had risen mainly to say that he totally disagreed with the statement made by the hon. Member for Tavistock (Sir John Trelawny), that the public would grudge the Vote before the Committee. His impression was, on the contrary, that they would feel a sensation of agreeable surprise at the moderation of the proposal made by the Government. From what he had heard in conversation, he believed that the general opinion out of doors was that a much larger proposition would have been submitted to the House. The public, too, would rejoice at the intimation, voluntarily given, that for the future the income of the Duchy was not to be anticipated by grants of leases for life. If that power had been retained, the managers of the Duchy would have had the means of raising a very large sum of money, ultimately at the expense of the country, and he was persuaded that the announcement of the noble Lord at the head of the Government would give great satisfaction to the public at large.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to ask if the accumulations were to be regarded as the private property of the Prince, or whether they were to be treated as the property of the Duchy.

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER stated that the accumulations having been made out of income which was legally the property of the Duchy of Cornwall, were of course to be regarded as belonging to the Prince of Wales, but their amount had been taken into view by the Government in considering the Vote before the Committee.

1. Resolved, Nemine Contradicente,

That the annual sum of £40,000 be granted to Her Majesty, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, towards providing for the Establishment of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Her Royal Highness the Princess Alexandra of Denmark, to commence from the Day of the Marriage of their Royal Highnesses.

2. Resolved, Nemine Contradicente,

That the annual sum of £10,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the said Consolidated Fund, to be paid quarterly to Her Royal Highness Princess Alexandra, for Her sole and separate use, during the period of their Royal Highnesses' Marriage.

3. Resolved, Nemine Contradicente,

That Her Majesty be enabled to secure to Her Royal Highness the Princess Alexandra, in case she shall survive His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, an annual sum not exceeding £30,000 during Her life, to support Her Royal Dignity.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS
BILL—[BILL 8.]—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

Mr. H. BERKELEY said, he rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He was induced to do so from the consideration that it was not a measure calculated to present a specimen of an electoral law worthy of the country. He was perfectly well aware that he might subject himself to certain taunts from his right hon. Friend below him, that he could not see any perfection in any measure except that particular measure which he had often brought before the attention of this House; but he could assure his right hon. Friend, that if he would produce any measure that should be effective in putting down the corruption of the electoral system, whatever that measure might be, he would throw aside all his preconceived opinions, and lend him his warmest co-operation. Now, the Bill (for he supposed it was in the form of a Bill) had been an Act of Parliament ever since the Earl of Aberdeen's administration. At that time there was an election, which was so corrupt that the Earl of Aberdeen expressed the opinion that our electoral system was such that nobody could well be enamoured of it. So flagrant were the acts committed during that election, which was a fierce contest between the parties on each side of this House, that it was thought necessary to do something, or to pretend to do something, to abate the evil. A Committee of that House was formed, consisting of a great many lawyers, and on their recommendation the Government of the day formed this Act of Parliament. Since that time it had been our electoral law. It had been tried; it had been weighed in the balance and found wanting; it was now found not only perfectly useless, but it was literally the laughing-stock of every attorney's clerk. This Bill was now in the hands of his right hon. Friend. The objections he had to it might be concisely stated. In the first place, he objected to its principle, which was to punish the elector, and not the candidate. It was in every way to protect the candidate, and to such an extent was that carried that with common care and attention any candidate's seat, do what he might, except personally or through one agent, was perfectly safe. Now, in the first place, her Majesty's Government thought proper to alter the law of agency, and by it nowadays the candidate was ordered to name his agent or agents, by whose acts he must stand or fall. To illustrate his meaning, he would suppose that Brown was named the agent. That being so, all that Brown would have to do would be to keep his hands clean and to take care that through him directly the candidate was drawn into no illegal proceeding. Meantime, however, Jones and Robinson, not being agents in the sense laid down in the Bill, might do as they pleased, and the candidate would not be held responsible for their acts. When the measure containing a provision which so operated had first been proposed, an analysis of it, to which were affixed the initials of the late Mr. James Coppock—than whom no man was better versed in election law—appeared in The Times newspaper, and his expression in relation to the clause was, "When the House of Commons passes it, the country will know what to believe;" while the journal in which the analysis was published summed up its estimate of the Bill with the words, "It is evident this is one of those pompous professions which are meant to be inoperative." Nothing could, in his opinion, be more just than that view, and what, he would ask, was the sugar-plum which induced the House of Commons to swallow so noxious a dose? It was the curtailment of the election expenses, the doing away with bands and other causes of outlay, in lieu of which the candidate might, by good management, indulge in illegal expenditure at discretion without running any risk. Such was the way in which the Bill dealt with the question of agency, but how did it provide against corruption generally and intimidation? Everybody knew that one of the most effectual modes of corruption was treating, and that the most successful mode of treating was the giving breakfasts to the electors on the morning of the day on which the poll was to take place. A stranger, for example, in company with some person well known in the locality, went into the house of a licensed victualler—he was speaking on the evidence of facts which had come within his own knowledge—in the town in which the election was to be held, and said to him, "I want forty breakfasts at seven o'clock on the election morning." The innkeeper, pulling off his hat, replied, "Certainly, Sir; the breakfasts shall be provided." The breakfasts were provided; they were duly eaten by a corresponding number of electors at the appointed hour, who went to the poll early, and thus opened the proceedings with an éclat which had its effect throughout the day; while if those breakfasts were not given to them, they would get breakfast at their own homes, would probably continue at work during the first half of the day, and then go to the poll after dinner. But the men who were breakfasted had another advantage. Their employers in the factory or the shipyards, or the overlookers, told them, "There is an election to-morrow," and they were excused the whole day; but their wages were paid. Now, was that bribery, or was it not? And they did not interfere with it by the Bill. Thus they went on, blindly satisfying themselves with ineffective legislation, and imagining that everybody else was satisfied. So much, then, for the law of agency and the way in which they abandoned corruption to take care of itself. Let them look now at what they had done with intimidation—a subject on which there was no division of opinion that it was the great evil of our electoral system. He knew that hon. Gentlemen who did not think proper to go with much minuteness into the question considered intimidation a part of the due influence of property. He was unable to consider it in that light, but rather as connected with the undue influence of property. Well, what did they propose to do on that subject by the Bill? They had proposed a wretched clause by which they said they would fine any individual who should affect with loss a man for giving his vote. Thus, if they took their custom away from the butcher, or baker, or turned a tenant out of his house, the aggrieved party might recover a penalty; but the recovery of the penalty was dependent upon the specific offence of the customer or the landlord making the giving of the vote the reason why he so acted. Could anything be more ridiculous? To show, indeed, how easily the provision could be evaded, it was sufficient to refer to what occurred after the late election for East Kent, when a landlord gave a tenant notice to quit, but added, "Take notice that it is not because you voted against my wishes at the election." That was, indeed, a state of things upon which, as was said by the late Sir Robert Peel and Lord Macaulay, they could not legislate. They could not legislate against a man for discharging or getting rid of his tradesman or of his tenant; and if they attempted to do it, they would be guilty of injustice. The Bill, then, would do nothing with regard to intimidation; and he thought, as the Government were pleased to reject the measure which he particularly advocated, and which he believed would be effective, they were bound to give the country a Bill that would at least palliate the evils of the present system. The last clause, by which the auditor was done away with, might be beneficial, but the Bill was so rotten and so bad that he had thought it necessary to call it to the attention of the House. It was not his intention, however, to ask for a division upon his Motion, but he had done his duty in bringing it forward, and he told the Government that under cover of this Act of Parliament at the next election, whenever that election should come, the richest party would win.

MR. M'MAHON complained that the Bill repealed parts of several Acts of Parliament, leaving only one or two sections or half sections in force, and suggested that it would be desirable in Committee so to alter the clauses as to repeal the entire Acts, and re-enact in the Bill those provisions which it was thought desirable to retain in force, and thus consolidate the Law into one general statute.

LORD HENLEY expressed his approval of the Bill generally. The auditorship, so called, had been a farce, and he was glad that it was abolished. He considered, however, that the provision that paid agents should not vote at elections was too stringent, and would produce greater evils than arose from the existing system. As it was necessary in contested elections to poll as many votes as possible, each candidate would have either to bring his attorneys, messengers, and doorkeepers from some other town, or to employ the relations only of voters, themselves having no votes, or else to give notice to all his agents that he would not pay them, and leave it to be understood that if elected he would exert his patronage to obtain places for them.

MR. BENTINCK said, he could not but venture to think that the annual discussion upon bribery and intimidation was neither more nor less than an annual farce. It was very much like the annual discussions which took place upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Bristol in reference to the ballot. The fact was, it led to no good result. The difficulty arose from the fact that neither in or out of the House was there any feeling that the act of bribery involved any moral culpability. That was the secret of the whole thing. The speeches on these occasions were very much like platform speeches, which in almost all cases had no meaning in them. The hon. Member for Bristol's great objection seemed to be that the candidate would escape detection and punishment, but the electors would not. And he said that it was perfectly impossible for the House to put an end to bribery and intimidation. The noble Lord the Member for Northampton gave the House to understand that in a contested election where matters were run hard everything was fair. After such expressions of opinion from two Liberal Members, was he overstating the case in maintaining that legislation such as the present was altogether a farce? It appeared to him that there was another view of the subject, which was always omitted upon these occasions. It was an old principle that charity ought to begin at home. Now, without entering upon a discussion whether that was a sound moral principle or not, he would ask the House to let justice begin at home? And how had the House proceeded in this matter? It appeared that a person keeping a post-office, with a wretched salary of £4 a year, was not allowed to vote, from a belief that some imaginary temptations to corruption were thereby guarded against. What must be the feeling of those men when they saw noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen in receipt of as many thousands as they had pounds giving votes in direct opposition to their public pledges? Was that justice? Was it a fair way of dealing with the people of this country? The whole proceeding was monstrous. A messenger rendered services for the remuneration which he received, and yet he, too, was to be precluded from voting, though gentlemen in the enjoyment of large pensions, and whose services it would be hard to define, were freely allowed to sit in that House and vote. A stronger case than any he had previously mentioned was afforded by the "testimonials" which hon. Members were allowed to receive. The gifts dignified by that name were neither more nor less than money paid for the price of a particular vote, and the Member receiving them was unmistakably bound to continue to vote in the same spirit. As long as such a system was upheld, they were bound in consistency to allow voters to receive every shilling they possibly could for their vote.

MR. POWELL said, he rose to express his regret, that while he could not support the Motion of which the hon. Member for Bristol had given notice, he could only give the second reading of the Bill a qualified support. He did not desire the Bill to be rejected, because (the measure being a continuation Bill) the country would thereby be deprived of some useful provisions which it contained. The Bill was, however, defective both in form and substance, and contained some clauses which were unnecessarily harsh, and to which he decidedly objected. The Bill was decidedly inferior to the measure introduced last Session by the right hon. Gentleman. That was to some extent a Consolidation Act, and as such very desirable, but the Bill before the House would merely add one more to the sixty or seventy Acts of Parliament to be found in the statute-book professing to regulate the election of Members of Parliament. That was a great evil in itself. If it were for the benefit of all classes that the law on the subject should be well defined and easily ascertained, it must be especially so in the case of Acts regulating the exercise of the franchise by great masses of the people. Now, however, if an elector wished to learn the obligations imposed upon him by the Legislature, he was bound to commence with the reign of Edward I., and to continue his examination of the statute-book down, and including the various Acts passed in the present reign. The right hon. Gentleman doubtless hoped, by avoiding the question of consolidation in the present Bill, to escape the innumerable Amendments which clustered round the measure of last year. But that was not a mode in which the Government or the House ought to legislate on topics so deeply affecting the people. It was rather a mockery of legislation, and he therefore hoped the present was merely intended to operate as a temporary arrangement, until the advisers of the Government had time to frame a Consolidation Act. There were also grave omissions from the Bill. It legislated at the wrong end, for, containing as it did very stringent provisions with regard to offending electors and constituencies, it failed to touch the root of the evil. If constituencies were corrupt, who corrupted them? If electors were bribed, who found the money? The candidates in truth; and among those candidates some, of course, were returned to that House. Before the Committee which sat on this subject two years ago several suggestions and propositions for meeting that difficulty were made, but the right hon. Gentleman had not adopted any of these; he contented himself with proposing what had hitherto been found inoperative in practice. But his objections were not limited to the omissions from the Bill. To one proposition introduced into the Bill he decidedly objected, representing as he did a constituency which had suffered by anticipation from the effect of such a clause. It would be in the recollection of the House that after the last general election commissions of inquiry appointed to examine into corrupt practices at Wakefield and Gloucester reported that at Gloucester, with a population of 17,000 and a constituency of 1,700, there were between 300 and 400 corrupt electors; and that at Wakefield, with 950 electors, there were 250 corrupt voters. The House on that occasion adopted a course which, speaking with the greatest humility, he ventured to think was unconstitutional. Of its own mere motion, without intending or professing to legislate, it took on itself to suspend the issue of the writs in both those boroughs, thereby confounding the corrupt with the innocent and punishing the innocent with the guilty. After an interval of two years the House, as indiscriminate in its mercy as in its severity, allowed the writs to issue once more, without restriction or legislation, although it knew the name of every person guilty of corruption in either place. It was contrary to every principle of justice to disfranchise the guilty and the innocent alike. There was not the least necessity for it. The commissions upon the Gloucester and Bristol elections were to all intents and purposes judicial inquiries; they were presided over by men of a great deal of judicial experience, and were armed by statute with great powers. They were, in fact, actual trials of the guilt of the persons who were brought before them; and if the Commissioners reported that certain persons were guilty of corrupt practices, and certain others were not, what justice could there be in disfranchising the whole constituency; and thus involving the innocent in the punishment of the guilty?

The Commissioners reported that at Gloucester there were a number of gentlemen who had for many years associated themselves together for the express purpose of insuring purity of election, and that they had been sometimes successful, as for instance in 1852, when they brought about a perfectly pure and free election. But because those gentlemen had not always succeeded, and because in a large constituency a comparatively small number of persons were corrupt, those gentlemen who had so greatly exerted themselves to secure purity of election would, nevertheless, be disfranchised by the Bill. That was a grave matter, and he ventured to say that a Bill with such a clause in it would prove inoperative, for the reason that all would be desirous of evading the law. He believed that a more futile measure had never been presented to the House of Commons. The fact was, they were taking too much trouble with the subject, and were seeking by a complex machinery to do that which might be done by a very simple process, which was to excise from the register and disfranchise inexorably not only every one who took, but every one who gave a bribe. With the view of providing for such a course of proceeding, he would propose Amendments in Committee.

MR. PHILLIPS said, he thought that much might be done to mitigate bribery, and that every one's experience would satisfy him that the expenses of elections were a great deal heavier before the Corrupt Practices Act than they had been since. Sums were formerly spent on elections to which recent times afforded no parallel. Absolute extirpation of the evil it was impossible to effect, but they ought not to rest under the reproach of not attempting to do what they could. The House would act imprudently if it would not give a second reading to the Bill, and its defects might be amended in Committee. There was this check upon bribery, that every one who practised it extensively fined himself. In many cases candidates had gone down to boroughs with the bona fide intention of paying no money unduly, and yet they were made responsible by persons over whom they had no control. It was therefore found necessary to provide a check for this practice. He agreed with the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Powell), that the proper remedy for bribery was disfranchisement. On the other hand, the House ought not to confound the innocent with the guilty, for if any severe penal enactments were attempted, the Bill would fail. He trusted that the Bill would be read a second time.

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT said, that having much considered the subject, and having heard a great deal of evidence on corrupt practices, he was convinced that the clauses of the Bill would have a very valuable effect in repressing corrupt practices. He did not agree with those who objected to the second clause, which was designed to stop up a very extensive source of corruption—namely, the employment in the business of the election of a number of persons whose services were required only for the purpose of securing their votes. The second clause was, in his opinion, the most valuable in the Bill. The tenth clause was also valuable, for nothing could be more futile than a pretence on the part of the Legislature to discourage bribery and intimidation, and yet to employ a machinery so cumbrous that in not more than one case in a hundred could the law be carried out. He did not concur with the hon. Member for Gloucester that there was injustice in suspending the writs of places guilty of corrupt practices. It was an ancient and equitable principle to hold a community infected by any crime responsible, and that, it was well known, was done in the case of the hundreds. Thus it would be the interest of the leaders of parties to prevent corruption becoming extensive and systematic. He was of opinion that the Bill had some very valuable provisions, and that the House would do well to read it a second time.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he thought the Bill was not likely to be valuable to any but the Government; who, having lost the name of reformers by abandoning reform, were desirous of doing something to win the name back again. There were many forms of bribery which the measure in no way touched. He would explain a very common form of bribery, by reference to an actual occurrence. When a Gentleman now representing a county in that House had stood for it, all persons, except one gentleman, had thought he had no chance of being returned. That one person said that the hon. Gentleman would be returned, and stated the majority by which he would gain the election. He was returned by a majority within two of the number named. Upon the individual who prophesied the result being asked how he had been able to predict it so accurately, he said that he held the maxim that politics had nothing whatsoever to do with an election; and he merely considered in which way it would be for the interest of persons to vote; that attorneys gave as many mortgages as possible to the surrounding farmers. It was then the interest of the candidate to retain the attorney for the sake of those over whom he had a hold. The attorney received his daily fee, and accompanied the candidate. If the voter was recalcitrant, the attorney said he was in want of money, and must call in the mortgage; and as a renewal of the mortgage would put the farmer to a great expense, the attorney was sure to be bought off by a promise of the vote. This sort of influence was not touched by the Bill. There were many other modes of bribery not touched by the measure. He would, for example, refer to the influence of Lords Lieutenant of counties. A person had been elected as captain in a volunteer corps, and had applied to the Lord Lieutenant of the County of Kent, the present Lord Chamberlain of the Household, to give him the nomination. The Lord Lieutenant, he had been informed, refused, observing that the person in question was a mere costermonger, for he had twice been chairman of the election committee of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Chatham. This person afterwards became High Constable of Chatham, and gave a grand dinner to a noble Lord, an eminent Minister of that House, who was brother-in-law to the Lord Lieutenant. After which, the commission so much sought by the person in question was very soon granted. Then, again, a Minister might barter his patronage for votes, and squander the interests of the country in order to benefit a faction. If the Minister were of a cool and cautious temperament, a significant gesture, or a whisper over the shoulder, might be quite sufficient to obtain the desired object; or the Minister might be of a more jovial turn of mind—might love hilarity and good cheer, and become most liberal with his patronage when his cheek was flushed with wine, and his heart was warmed by unwon'ted fire, and his tongue loosed with unaccustomed eloquence. He would mention a fact that had occurred on October 29, at Chatham. As it concerned the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty, he had given him notice of his intention to refer to it. The noble Lord went down to Chatham when every one thought a general election was impending, and took with him his brother-in-law, Mr. Otway. Mr. Otway had been rejected by Tynemouth, Stafford, and Chatham, and was again likely to become a candidate for Chatham. At the public dinner the noble Lord made a speech. The noble Lord commenced by apologizing for his appearing there at all; representing, as he did, "another part of the county, the different constituencies of which were like families, somewhat jealous of each other;" for he had not yet visited his own constituency, when he went to Chatham to canvass for Otway. He then went on to say, he might be asked why he had come to Chatham. Now, that was a pertinent question. But the noble Lord himself had answered the query by saying "he went in obedience to superior orders; he had heard a voice saying, 'Paget, you are wanted at Chatham.'" Now, that voice could be no other than that of the noble Viscount at the head of the Government; no one would have ventured to make such large promises as the noble Lord made, without the noble Viscount's authority. The noble Secretary of the Admiralty, however, went on to tell his hearers that "Chatham was about to become one of the most important naval stations in the kingdom." Now, that was a proposition involving probably the expenditure of millions, and of course met with "loud cheers" from the electors of Chatham. The noble Secretary then told them that Chatham was "about to possess the most magnificent arsenal that England, or, in fact, all the world, had ever possessed;" that "the basin accommodation of Chatham would surpass the whole of the boasted basin accommodation of France put together." This was, no doubt, a very good way of conciliating the electors of Chatham, but was not calculated to win the favour of the taxpayers of England. It was for the House to say whether these great works were to be constructed, and those large sums expended. It was not for the noble Secretary to make promises in our name, which we were only to ratify and fulfil. The House was not to be let into the secret of its future conduct by a speech of a Secretary to an after-dinner audience in a dockyard; as if the House were unworthy to be more than that Minister's instrument. But the noble Secretary went somewhat further than that, by telling his audience, the electors of Chatham, that they had no fear of France, for that England "was never in a better position to enter into war nor with a navy in a more efficient state." That speech was certainly not complimentary to the French; nay, it was insulting to them. Although, indeed, the braggadocio may have been in reality directed, not to the conquest of France, but to the corruption of Chatham. Or if it were said in excuse that this speech was merely an after-dinner indiscretion, then it was another instance of what was so common last year—namely, "ministerial mudlarking." After those lugubrious civilities had passed at Chatham, the noble Lord returned to London with his brother-in-law by a special train. Now he (Lord Robert Montagu) should like to know how that train was paid for? Perhaps that transaction was quietly managed by a draw upon the civil contingencies? or, seeing that it was after dinner and wine, was it paid by a vote in excess? He mentioned those facts for the purpose of showing one way by which a Minister might bribe the electors without being restrained by the proposed Bill. Some just remarks had been made in regard to intimidation. He gathered from the public prints that the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty was accused of having intimidated some of the electors of Totnes into voting for the man of his choice. He had been informed that the noble Duke had issued a threat to turn the electors out of their holdings and deprive them of their cowsheds. He also saw in the leading journal an extract from a local paper stating that "Mr. J. Pender had placed the magnificent sum of £1,000 at the disposal of a committee in order to be applied to the general welfare of the inhabitants of Totnes." But that "the gift had not been promulgated because the election was going on," but the writer of the paragraph said "he saw no reason why it should any longer be kept a secret." Such were the acts of Liberal Members. It was only the name of "Reformers" which screened them from the ire of the people. He put it to the House to say whether the Bill would, in the least, restrain bribery and corruption from being practised in the three or four modes he had pointed out; and whether the sole object of the Government in bringing it forward was not to recover for themselves an empty reputation as Reformers? For any other end he thought the Bill would be wholly inoperative.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he should support the second reading, because he believed the Bill would effect an important amendment of the law, while he thought that its rejection would have the effect of throwing the whole law in respect to bribery into confusion.

MR. PACKE said, no person was more opposed to bribery than himself. He would, therefore, cordially support the second reading of the Bill. There was, however, one clause very comprehensive indeed, inasmuch as it took within its provisions every agent, attorney, poll-clerk, messenger, and other person employed at elections. It should, however, be recollected that there were many persons employed at elections who were not interested for either of the candidates. It ought to be carefully considered whether those parties, however neutral, ought to be included in the general charge. He totally disagreed with the hon. and learned Member for Gloucester (Mr. Powell) as to the operation of the 11th clause. He thought that that clause conveyed a wholesome warning to constituents against bribery. But there was another class of persons who sinned in a different way. He was concerned some years ago in the investigation of a serious riot, arising from the circumstance that voters had been prevented going to poll in consequence of the crowds of non-electors that assembled round the doors of public-houses, which were kept open during the whole time in close proximity to the polling-places. He thought much mischief might be prevented by requiring those public places to be kept closed during the days of nomination and voting.

SIR GEORGE GREY:—As the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley) has waived his objection to the second reading of the Bill, it will only be necessary for me to advert to some of the objections made to particular clauses. I readily admit that the Bill will not put a complete and effectual stop to all corrupt practices at elections. I am not presumptuous enough to suppose that I could frame a measure which would achieve that result. As long as human nature remains as it is, as long as there are objects of ambition to be sought after, and persons willing to accept bribes, it will be impossible for any law entirely to prevent corruption. All that can be done is to render bribery as difficult as possible, the detection of bribery as easy as possible, and the punishment of offenders as certain as possible. The noble Lord opposite, who professes to be conversant with all the arts of bribery and corruption, practised in county elections, said he would undertake to evade the Bill in fifty different ways. That may be quite possible; but although we cannot do everything by legislation, that is no reason why we should not attempt to do anything. I do not claim credit for any originality in this measure. It is based on the Resolutions of the Committee of the House which considered and reported upon the Acts in operation some three years ago. A complaint has been made by the hon. and learned Member for Gloucester (Mr. Powell) that the Bill is directed rather against electors than candidates; but in that respect it has followed the recommendations of the Committee, and I think he has not drawn the distinction between those recommendations and proposals that were made and rejected. An hon. Member made a proposal in the Committee, to require a declaration from Candidates, but it was not pressed to a vote. With respect to the clause disqualifying agents, I have to observe that it was contained in a former Act, and evidence was given before the Committee that its omission from the last Act has led to a great deal of bribery. Since the Bill has been printed I have received letters testifying to the importance of the clause, and stating that large numbers of electors have been employed in some places as messengers or in some such capacity to influence their votes. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) has complained that we have disfranchised country postmasters who may not receive more than £4 a year from the State, while leaving in possession of their votes persons in receipt of fixed incomes from the public revenue. I do not propose any change in the law with regard to the holders of post-offices. Their exclusion is part of the existing law which was in force in the last century, which prohibits all persons engaged in the collection of public revenue from voting for Members of Parliament. It is obvious, on the other hand, that retired officers and others in receipt of fixed incomes not held at the pleasure of the Crown may be quite as independent as any other persons in the country. There is no analogy between them and those employed in the collection of revenue. I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Reading (Mr. Serjeant Pigott) as to the clause which provides a new mode of dealing with the reports of Commissions of Inquiry, when those Commissions report that extensive bribery has prevailed in certain constituencies. I also agree with the hon. and learned Member for Gloucester (Mr. Powell) that the course pursued by the House as to the writs for Wakefield and Gloucester was open to objection. For this House, without the authority of law, to continue the suspension of writs for any considerable period, is a course which I think should not be encouraged. What is now proposed is that the House should be empowered by law to suspend writs for a limited period in cases where corruption, though not universal, is general and extensive. I believe such a provision, if enacted, would create a general desire in a borough to prevent bribery and corruption, and would induce persons of influence, instead of looking on such practices with indifference, to exert themselves to put down all illegal practices. Some proof of this is afforded by the fact that no complaint of bribery or corruption has been made with regard to the last elections for Gloucester and Wakefield. The hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) said, that in amending any Act we should take the opportunity to consolidate the whole law on the subject. An attempt of that kind was made last Session; but, as has been already said, a number of Amendments clustered round every clause, and I believe it would be found impossible within any reasonable time to pass such a measure through the House. I have, therefore, thought it better to make this Bill more moderate in its pretensions, embodying in it the main provisions recommended by the Select Committee. I am glad to find that the Motion for the second reading meets with the general assent of the House, and I trust that when we go into Committee the Amendments will be discussed with an earnest desire to make the law as effective as possible.

MR. BENTINCK said, he had not objected to the officers on half-pay having votes; but what he said was, that so long as Members of that House, receiving large salaries and pensions, had votes in that House, it was a hard measure to prevent a post-office employé in a country town from exercising his right of voting.

MR. BRADY said, he had consistently opposed the Bills which had been introduced on the subject, as he did not believe that the House was honest in its desire to put down bribery. If it were, it would punish, not the offending electors, but those who bribed them.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH maintained that all illegal payments should be made bribery, and punished accordingly. He announced his intention to propose some Amendments in Committee.

Bill read 2^d, and committed for Thursday next.

[BILL 17.] SECOND READING.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he rose to move the second reading of the Bill. The policy of the Act which this Bill sought to continue had been discussed a few nights since, when several suggestions, as the House would remember, were made by hon. Members well entitled to speak upon the subject. Their observations were not opposed to the principle or the purpose of the Bill, but were chiefly intended to render legislation upon it more complete. He had promised, at the time, that the suggestions then made should receive the fullest attention of the Government, and that he would take an early opportunity of stating the course it was intended to pursue. As time was pressing, the Act expiring on the 1st of March, it would perhaps be convenient that he should then state what it was proposed to do. The first suggestion was made by the noble Lord the Member for Kings Lynn (Lord Stanley), who, founding his opinion upon what he considered was their imperfect experience of this Act, and the uncertain character of the circumstances that had led to its necessity, recommended that the period of its continuance provided for in the Bill should be shortened. That suggestion was supported by his hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), and others, including the hon. Member for North Lancashire, who were of opinion that the whole subject should receive a more deliberate consideration during the present Session. Since then he had had many communications from the districts most affected, and he had received an important deputation that had waited upon him upon the subject; and he was bound to say there was a general concurrence of opinion that the time should be limited, so as to admit of another discussion. He had not changed his own opinion, because he believed that the more experience they had of the Act, and the more they reflected upon the circumstances which had led to its enactment, the more they would see that a longer continuance would be necessary. But as he believed it would be re-enacted, and not wishing to expose himself to the charge of desiring to save himself trouble, he was not disposed to resist the general feeling in favour of further curtailing the duration of the Bill. He therefore proposed that the Act should be renewed only for the next two quarters, and that about June, when it would expire, the House should have an opportunity of renewing the Act or of allowing it to cease. Another suggestion had also been made, which he thought had received even more general support than the last, and that was that the period for repayment of loans should be extended over a greater number of years. When the power to raise money by loans was first conferred upon the boards of guardians, some apprehensions were entertained lest the power of borrowing might influence the guardians, in their mode of administering the Law, and some persons, indeed, thought that the distress was hardly sufficient to warrant such exceptional legislation, and that it would probably cease before Parliament met again. In that hope they had been disappointed, for the prospects were hardly better than they were at the close of last Session, and in some respects perhaps they were more gloomy, but he was bound to say, from all the information he had collected, that the Act had not had the smallest effect in producing irregularity or rendering the administration of the Poor Law by the guardians more lax. The manner in which the Poor Law had been administered during the last six months had shown no disposition to neglect the rules and orders under which the guardians usually acted, and there had been almost an indisposition to avail themselves of the new powers conferred upon them. Under these circumstances he could not feel any scruple in conferring further facilities upon the ratepayers to enable them better to meet the extraordinary charge thrown upon them by this peculiar distress; and he was ready to accede to the proposition which seemed to unite the greatest amount of opinion in its favour, which was, that the annual instalment paid with a view to the liquidation of the debt should be one fourteenth, instead of one-seventh; or, in other words, that the period for repayment of the money should be extended from seven to fourteen years. He believed that this might further encourage the unions to borrow money where there was an excess of expenditure, or perhaps strengthen the disposition which had already been shown to raise money in that way, rather than by seeking contributions in aid from other unions. There was only one other alteration in the Bill which he would propose, and that was rather the correction of an error in the original Act than any real change. In the 5th section it was provided that unions whose expenditure for the relief of the poor reached 3s. in the pound should not be required to contribute to other distressed unions; but, in consequence of the peculiar wording of the clause, it had been held that they were not entitled to include as expenditure for the relief of the poor contributions which they had been called upon to make to other unions. Such could not have been the intention of Parliament, and he proposed therefore in this respect to amend the section in the original Act. With these alterations, from information he had received, he thought he was justified in believing that those who were most interested in the subject would allow the Bill to be now read a second time, and to pass subsequently, and postpone to a future day any discussion upon other points. Even any discussion on points connected with the particular Bill would, he trusted, not be pressed then, but would be reserved for the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he for one was not at all desirous of offering any obstacle to the progress of the Bill. He had stated, on a former occasion, that he believed that a renewal of the Act of last Session was necessary, and he felt bound to tender his thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for the manner in which he had met most of the objections raised upon the former occasion. But he could not conceal from the right hon. Gentleman that he had not met all the objections to the present Bill. He had, by his Amendments, met two of the chief objections, but there was another with which he had not dealt, which was well worthy of his consideration. Last Session his right hon. Friend said he preferred a rate in aid to a simple loan raised upon the security of the rates of the township or union, because it was more in accordance with the Act of Elizabeth; and the noble Lord the first Lord of the Treasury, said, that as the land in Lancashire had reaped the benefit of its proximity to the manufacturing districts, it ought to be called upon to assist in bearing the burden before help was demanded from any other part of the country. No doubt that was a just principle to lay down; but when the Act came into operation, it was found that the rate fell exclusively upon the tenants and occupiers, and not upon the landlords. His constituents said with truth, that though the farms and houses which they occupied had been enhanced in value by their situation, yet in taking them the occupiers had always to give their full value for them, and all the advantages of situation were considered in the rent. Lancashire farmers were thus in no better position than farmers in any other part of England. It was true that they had a better market for their produce than some possessed. But they paid for that advantage in their rent, and they thought it very hard, therefore, that the distressed unions should come upon them. He hoped that his right hon. Friend would consider that matter well before the Bill came into Committee. He was himself a landlord, and his interest thus lay the other way, but he thought there was much reason in the argument which he had mentioned; and if his right hon. Friend would only accede to the proposal which he had made last year, the objection would be met. There was another matter which, he trusted, would be maturely considered. His right hon. Friend should give more easy powers of raising the money than now existed, and then he should go a little further and enable the unions to take advantage of an Act of 1848, in which the Exchequer Loan Commissioners were empowered to advance money for works connected with the health of towns, and one or two other objects. The unions were allowed to raise money for fourteen years, but there was always a disadvantage in getting money in that way. In proof he might state that the banks of Manchester had refused to lend money to the different unions upon the terms of the Act, as being contrary to their principles of business; and the consequence was, that the limits within which the unions could borrow money being contracted, they had to pay a higher rate of interest than would be otherwise necessary. The lowest rate they were paying was $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; but if they were allowed to borrow under the Act of 1848, they would be able to raise money at 4 per cent. Another grievance was, that unions which had paid a comparatively heavy rate should be called upon to afford assistance to unions which for a number of years had paid a much lower rate. For instance, one union which had to pay a rate of more than 2s. was now called upon to afford aid to unions whose average rate of relief for many years past had been 7d., 9d., 10d., or 11d. Such unions complained that it was very hard that in these bad times they should be obliged to help those who had been so much better off than they were themselves. With regard to the complaint of the occupiers which he had already mentioned, it might be said, "Let the landlords come forward and pay the increased rates." But during the last six months the landlords had voluntarily contributed a rate in aid greater by an immense amount than any rate which they would be called on to pay as landlords. He thought that the rate in aid should in justice cease, and that on the other hand greater facilities should be given to the guardians to raise the necessary funds by loan.

MR. GREGSON said, he must beg to compliment the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken upon the part he had taken during the distress, and the time and attention which he had bestowed upon the work of relief. It was important that the House should consider the circumstances in which the distressed districts were placed, and the prospect that existed of a termination or diminution of the distress. If the calamitous war which unhappily raged in America were to end immediately, of course they would receive a supply of cotton to employ the operatives for the present; but, looking at the uncertain continuance of slavery in the South, the question presented itself whether they could prudently retain so many thousands of people in the cotton trade, expecting their former full and permanent employment at satisfactory wages? Again, if the war should continue, though other countries would send increased supplies of cotton, there was little prospect of a supply sufficient to employ all the operatives as before; and therefore, instead of remaining in hopeless and demoralizing idleness, would it not be kind and wise to recommend some portion of them to look out for other employment? Another question arose whether, if, as was now expected, they were receiving cotton enough to give work for three or four days in the week, the production would not be ample for the consumption of the world, especially as that consumption must necessarily be checked by an increase of price. That was a third reason for seeking other fields of labour for many of the cotton operatives. That the production of our cotton manufacturers had been too abundant was generally admitted. On that point he had received a letter from Calcutta, dated December 8, 1862, in which the writer said—

"I do not think that people at home take into due consideration the extreme incredulity of the natives here in any representations made to make them pay more than they are accustomed to do for goods of any kind. They have no idea (up country at least) of the extent and reality of the cotton famine; they believe it is all got up by the Feringhees to get money out of them, and they will not give the long prices now asked, unless under very extreme pressure. I believe them to be very much better prepared to hold out for a year than the poor of England are. A decently respectable poor man here will give up to a certain price for cloth enough for a change of raiment, but will rather go without the change—aye, and will rather wear his dhootie for six months longer—than give an anna more for his cloth; and remember that clothing in this country is not such a necessity as in Europe, and that an enormous proportion of those who consume our English cotton goods, are people who will much sooner go all but naked than pay for such cloth a price which makes a hole in the proportion set aside for purchase of food. I mean to say, after this, that consumption has been so very seriously affected, apparently by the high prices, that it is vain to count upon it with any certainty at all. I believe, from all that I can gather and all I see, that prices will advance very little indeed while the natives know we have such stocks here."

Instead of allowing the people to remain in idleness and to some extent in demoralization, it appeared to him they should be recommended to seek employment elsewhere. The supply of cotton from India depended very much on the continuance of high prices. He had seen a very curious document the other day—namely, a bond from the Southern States of America for 50,000lb. of Orleans cotton, at 6d. per lb., deliverable at any port of shipment, free of export duty, forty days after the presentation of the bond. He thought the purchase of such bonds would be a good speculation, and was himself rather tempted to buy one. By these bonds the South was enabled to obtain the sinews of war.

GENERAL LINDSAY said, he considered the limitation of the Act to six months as very judicious. At the expiration of that period its provisions could be much more satisfactorily discussed, after the information and experience which its full operation would afford. He fully concurred in the objections which had been urged to the working of the rate in aid. He had presented a petition from the board of guardians of Wigan, where the local contributions for the distressed unions had been extremely liberal, where the rates had been kept down below the maximum of 3s. in the pound, and where they had hitherto been able to keep their people as well, if not better, than those in other towns of Lancashire. But they now found themselves called upon, being a distressed union themselves, to pay for other distressed unions. This was felt to be a very considerable grievance by the small class of shopkeepers, whose poor rates would be increased; and the hardship was felt all the more because the cotton business in Wigan was comparatively very small. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would turn his attention to this subject.

MR. E. C. EGERTON said, he wished to call attention to the sixth clause of the Act of last Session which constituted a special grievance on some of the unions in Cheshire. It declared that where the union applying for aid shall extend into two or more counties, the contribution in aid shall come from that county in which the greater part of the union is situated; and where the union required to contribute shall be situated in two or more counties, it shall only contribute in that county in which the greater part of it shall be situated. Now, any one reading the clause would imagine that the contribution was to come from the county in which the largest portion of the rateable value of the union was situate. That was the reasonable construction; but, to the surprise of many unions, the Poor Law authorities held that geographical area, and not rateable value, decided the liability. In that way Cheshire was called upon to contribute to Ashton-under-Lyne; and that was a hardship which called for immediate remedy, as there was an enormous extent of rateable value in Ashton, far exceeding that in Cheshire. During the last three years the town he had the honour to represent (Macclesfield) had paid higher rates than any district in Lancashire or Cheshire. The town was principally dependent on the silk manufacture, which had been unusually depressed, so that for the last three years the poor rates in Macclesfield had been nearly 4s. 6d. in the pound; and now, after paying all their own burdens without obtaining relief from other unions, they were called on to contribute their quota to the relief of the district of Ashton-under-Lyne. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would endeavour to meet the grievance of such a case.

MR. ALDERMAN SIDNEY said, that the measure was at first intended to last for another twelve months; but the right hon. Gentleman had since consented, not in accordance with his own judgment, but in deference to opinions expressed in that House, to curtail its operations to the next six months. He considered the proposal to extend the term for the repayment of the money borrowed by the union a very hazardous one. Great anxiety, too, had arisen in those unions which were to be made liable to the support of distant districts under the question of the rate in aid system; and that anxiety would naturally increase for the future if, as there was reason to apprehend, the contributions of individuals for the mitigation of the distress were greatly to diminish. The Poor Law must have broken down in the most disgraceful manner but for the £800,000 contributed by voluntary subscriptions to the relief of the distress. Under the circumstances, it was astonishing that the Legislature were so supine. It could not be expected that the sufferings of the manufacturing districts would terminate in six months; and therefore the general Poor Law ought to be at once dealt with in a comprehensive spirit. The people of Lancashire felt that the present distress was a great national calamity, and that the Consolidated Fund ought to bear its pressure. ["No!"] Why should they wait for an emergency like that to teach them the common principles of justice? If the maintenance of the poor was to be regarded as a national charge, it was not right that the property of Lancashire should be borne down while other districts were comparatively unaffected. There were gross inequalities in the taxation of different places for the relief of the poor, and an undue burden was thrown upon the poorer parts of that metropolis, while the richer parishes were allowed to escape their fair contribution. The whole question of the Poor Law ought to receive the attention of the Legislature, and be dealt with in a large and statesmanlike spirit. In Committee on the Bill the Government should be urged to extend the principle of the rate in aid to the entire country.

MR. HUMBERSTON said, he saw no necessity for pressing on the measure with undue haste. Before being passed it ought to be well considered, and the country should have an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon it. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would consider the Amendments he proposed to make in the Bill previous to its going into Committee. Great hardship was inflicted on unions in the county of Chester by the construction put on the Rate in Aid Act of 1862, as described by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. E. C. Egerton). Cheshire had been called upon to contribute upwards of £8,000 towards the union of Ashton-under-Lyne, which lay partly in Lancashire and partly in Cheshire. The portion of the population of that union which belonged to Lancashire exceeded 80,000, while that which belonged to Cheshire was about 50,000; and the greater proportion of its rateable property was also situated in the former county. He thought greater facilities should be given to unions for borrowing money. The rate in aid was vicious in principle, calculated to produce a reckless expenditure, and tended to check private benevolence. If, however, there was to be a rate in aid, he could not see why it should be confined to the two counties in which the cotton distress prevailed. If there were a rate in aid, the proper course to adopt, he thought, would be to make it a national rate, and he would further express a hope that the President of the Poor Law Board would give greater facilities of borrowing to the Unions, and that the Exchequer Loan Commissioners would be enabled to make advances at a moderate rate of interest. If that were done, the unions might be placed in a position to tide over the difficulties of the present crisis without having recourse to a rate in aid, which in itself was open to objection. He would, in addition, simply ask the right hon. Gentleman not to hurry the Bill through, but to allow the country full time to consider its provisions.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD said, he had to tender his thanks to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board for the zeal and courtesy which he had brought to bear on the discharge of the duties of his office, so far as they related to the distress in the manufacturing districts. He (Lord E. Howard) had been horror-struck at having heard the hon. and gallant Member for North Lancashire (Colonel W. Patten) declaim against a rate in aid. Nor was it to be wondered at that such was the case, inasmuch as he happened to live in a union in which, unfortunately, the destitution was so great that the relief of the poor was provided for only at the enormous rate of 24s. in the pound. In that union, indeed, scarcely anything worth while could have been effected but for the splendid liberality which had been manifested in all directions, but which it would be too much to expect would be continued for any lengthened period. What then, he would ask, was to be done in localities so situated, of which there would be many if the war in America were not before long brought to a close? He, for one, saw no resource under the circumstances save a rate in aid judiciously administered. It was, he might further observe, on the frugality and honesty of the inhabitants of the manufacturing districts—those qualities which were so much held up to the admiration of the country—that the rates in the North were now levied. Their burden fell most heavily on the man who, having bought a cottage, which was, perhaps, for part of its value mortgaged to a building society, had no large margin to spare even in ordinary times, but who in times of exceptional pressure found himself in the greatest possible difficulty. The small shopkeeper, too, who had saved money barely sufficient to set himself up in business and to support his family in tolerable comfort, felt their weight most soresly, while the small farmer on the hill-side, who held some twenty or twenty-five acres of land, and who now could find no market for the produce of the few cows he happened to possess, would be exposed to utter ruin if the rates were long to continue at their present high level. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board was therefore, he thought, entitled to the gratitude of the country for having extended the short term originally embraced in the Relief Act to fourteen years, and he should wish that the right hon. Gentleman would also see the expediency of lending Government money to the distressed districts. He knew an instance in which £50,000 had been lent to a Railway Company whose line ran through an impoverished locality, to carry on the works there; and if that was done then with the object of affording aid where it was needed, why should not a similar course be pursued with advantage in the case of Lancashire? Only the other day money had been borrowed in the county for the relief of the poor at the rate of 4 per cent, and negotiations were entered into for the loan of several thousands more at the rate of 4½ per cent—a large sum to pay in the shape of interest. Now, the Government would, he could not help thinking, confer a great benefit on a district so situated by the simple process of lending them money at the rate of 3½ or 3 per cent, or some rate so small that they would not suffer a loss by the loan. He was glad, he might add, that the present Act was to be renewed for a shorter period than twelve months, because long before the expiration of that time they might see a better or a worse state of things prevailing in Lancashire, and because he did not believe the wisest man in the country could predict what its condition would be—he would not say six, but even one month from the present time. The manufacturers of Lancashire might just then have a small supply of cotton, which enabled them to employ a certain number of hands, though at a loss, but they would soon work that supply out; and when they required more, they might at any moment find the price so advanced by the speculators of Liverpool as to render it impossible that their trade could be continued. So it would be with the large imports of cotton expected from India, which, judging from the experience of 1862, would be so spread over the year as to afford great room for speculation. Those things being taken into account, it would at once be seen how critical was the crisis which the House had to meet, and he for one thanked the President of the Poor Law Board for the spirit in which he had dealt with it.

MR. EVANS said, that his constituents felt themselves aggrieved by the operation of the Act, but he hoped that their opposition would be mitigated by the announcement that the Act was to be continued for only six months, and that the time for the repayment of loans was to be extended from seven to fourteen years. He thought that it was worth the consideration of the Government whether they should not themselves make loans to boards of guardians.

MR. HIBBERT said, he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board had not acceded to one of the two suggestions which he had made the other evening—that of empowering the Government to lend money to the boards of guardians. The feelings of the different boards of guardians were decidedly in unity upon that point, having found very great difficulty in borrowing money from private sources. There were some other points which deserved the consideration of the House—one was with respect to the time when the borrowing powers should commence, and another with respect to the time when the rate in aid upon other unions should commence. The borrowing powers in the Act of last Session commenced after the expenditure had exceeded the rate of 3*s.* in the pound. Now, it was felt to be a very great hardship in many unions that they were obliged to expend an amount equal to the rate of 3*s.* in the pound before they were enabled to get any relief under the Act; and it would be a very great relief if the borrowing point were reduced from the rate of 3*s.* in the pound to 2*s.*, for the rate of 2*s.* in the pound was fully equal in pressure to a rate of 3*s.* when the Act of last Session was passed, considering the means of those who had to pay. The other point was with respect to the rate in aid. Last Session he had felt a strong aversion to that principle. He was in favour of liberal borrowing powers. But he would be sorry now, after they had brought the rate-in-aid clause into operation, to see it struck out of the Bill. He would, however, offer the suggestion to his right hon. Friend, whether it would not to some extent do away with the hardship imposed upon many contributing unions if the point at which the rate in aid should commence were raised from 5*s.* to 6*s.* He trusted the House would be inclined to give liberal powers to Lancashire, as she had not come thither asking for national aid.

MR. COBDEN said, that he accepted with satisfaction the proposal of his right hon. Friend to extend the time during which the repayment of loans might take place; but as the discussion had taken a hostile tone towards another part of the Bill, which might probably increase the intensity of the opposition out of doors before they met again, he would say a word or two with regard to it. He was not last year at all enamoured of the rate in aid. What he then desired was that greater facilities of borrowing should be given to boards of guardians. He still entertained that opinion, and he believed that it was shared by all the boards of guardians in Lancashire. They were thwarted, however, in that wish—not so much, he believed, by his right hon. Friend, who, in his political career, had never been much afraid of a reform or an innovation, as by the Board over which he presided, which had a great objection to any change in its traditional policy of a rate in aid. Had the desired facilities for borrowing been given, he did not believe that the rate in aid would have been called into action, or that the question would have arisen to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson Patten) had devoted so many remarks. That hon. and gallant Gentleman had complained of the inconvenience which this rate in aid occasioned to occupying tenants whose rents had been fixed without any anticipation of such an increase of poor rate. That was an evil which was not very easily remedied, but it might in some degree be met—not altogether without difficulty, however—by the adoption of a clause enabling them to charge the whole or part of the increase of rate upon the landlord. That to which he particularly wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman was that the principle of a rate in aid was inherent in our Poor Law legislation; that it was part of our Poor Law code, not so much in the interest of property as for the protection of the rights of the poor. A part of a county might arrive at such a state of pauperism that it could not support its poor, and in that case it must call upon the rest of the county for assistance. That might be considered as part of our Constitution, and must be preserved as an alternative. They could not dispense with it, whatever checks or guards they might surround it with. If a district of Lancashire became utterly pauperized and property valueless, the people could not be allowed to starve; but he did not contemplate the possibility or necessity of that, provided there were no obstacles thrown in the way of the guardians for an easy mode of borrowing money. The manufacturing districts of Lancashire were quite in accord with the agricultural districts in the opinion that facilities should be given to borrow money rather than resort to the rate in aid, because with liberal borrowing powers, with free borrowing powers, and with the aid of the great fund in hand, it was likely that every union in Lancashire would, for the next twelve months, be able to maintain its poor without applying to the rest of the county. Why, then, as he said last year, should any restriction be, for twelve months at least, placed in the way of these unions borrowing money to meet their difficulties? In Rochdale, a borough which was not so badly off as some others, because there was in it some production of flannel, 20,000 were receiving relief, at the rate of about 2s. per week per head, which amounted to about £100,000 a year. The yearly value of the rateable property of Rochdale was £225,000, and taking this at a very low estimate would be worth £3,000,000. Finding itself, with all this property, in a dilemma, which they hoped would prove but temporary, and naturally wishing to relieve itself from so unpleasant a position, how was Rochdale to act? How would an individual act? Because that was always the best test in such matters. How would an individual act with £3,000,000 of property unencumbered and wanting £100,000 on an emergency during the next twelve months? Clearly, he would borrow the money. It would be a legitimate transaction, and he would get the money on easy terms. Then, why not allow Rochdale to do the same? The guardians of Rochdale had been unanimous in their wish to be allowed to exercise unchecked control over their property in that way. What said the Legislature, however, on the subject? It said, "Before you can borrow you must have paid poor rates at the rate of 3s. in the pound per annum for the preceding quarter." That in round figures, taking Rochdale as an illustration, meant this—that before that union could borrow £5,000, it must have raised in poor rates £9,000. Now, that in the present condition of that Borough, amounted to a sort of slow torture. He then in the name of that union, with an assessed rental of £225,000, worth at least £3,000,000, asked the House to let those people do what they like with their property for another twelve months. No, he did not say even with the whole of it; he repeated the suggestion he made last year—let the House insert in the Bill, if they would, a limitation as to the amount which might be borrowed, and let it be in proportion to their rateable property. As in the case of Rochdale, which would be an illustration of other unions, let them insert, if they would, a clause restricting the borrowing powers of that union during the next twelve months to the limit of 50 per cent on the amount of the assessed annual value of their property; in other words permit Rochdale to borrow, during the twelve months, £100,000 upon the security of their property, worth £3,000,000. He asked again, in the name of common sense and humanity, by what conceivable stupidity could anybody step in and say, "No, they shall not borrow until they inflict upon themselves this pecuniary fine just at a time when when so many are unable to pay it." What was the effect of levying those rates? In Oldham, they had heard, that for every rate they levied they squeezed out of existence 4,000 ratepayers; that was they compelled 4,000 ratepayers to go to the magistrates, plead poverty and their inability to pay. It was all very well for the rich to write out a cheque for the amount of the poor rate; but by every rate levied they were driving into the ranks of pauperism a large number of ratepayers. Now, he asked his right hon. Friend to shake off altogether the influence of those hereditary red-tapists with whom he was associated, and take the matter into his own hands. Let him meet the Members who represented the manufacturing and agricultural districts of Lancashire, and let them talk the matter over, and arrange it upon a principle of common sense before the House went into Committee upon it. If the right hon. Gentleman would only consult his own excellent sense and his courage, then he would no doubt deal with the matter in a way acceptable to the manufacturing districts, by which they might avoid the difficulty which the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel W. Patten) referred to in the operation of the rate in aid, and thus perhaps enable the parties interested to carry themselves through that great calamity in a way the least hurtful to themselves and the least injurious to their neighbours.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he felt the full force of what had been urged in favour of the giving of liberal borrowing powers. He was sorry to say that he had been engaged in the administration of relief in a district where the rates had been not merely 3s. in the pound, but 8s. and even 9s.; and therefore he was in a position to estimate the weight of the pressure upon the manufacturing districts. The suggestion he wished to make to the right hon. Gentleman was, that the borrowing powers should be resorted to to a certain point before the rate in aid was brought into operation. The reason was the difficulty which had been found, in the administration of relief, to prevent the relief, whether contributed by the bounty of the public or the rate in aid, if that money was not raised by the locality immediately distressed, being subjected to the abuse of the old Poor Law—that was the payment of the money in aid of wages. He was sorry to say that his own experience had brought him face to face with that difficulty, to obviate which he had made the suggestion. Now, with respect to the rate in aid, if they once threw that upon the owner instead of the occupier, they would plunge at once into the difficulty of a maladministration of that fund, because the owners, being few in number, and exercising little influence upon the administrative body, they would find the old abuse growing up, and money distributed in aid of wages. Once get into that system, and there was no remedy: they never knew to what extent their expenditure would go, and could not tell at what period it would stop. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in the event of the Bill being amended, he would be prepared, upon evidence of the existence of sufficient distress, to admit other districts than those of Lancashire, Cheshire, Yorkshire, and Derbyshire to come within the provisions of this Bill?

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH said, he thought there was great force in the arguments of the hon. Member for Rochdale, that unions should be left to the exercise of their common sense in such great difficulties as presented themselves at the present moment. It was not the amount but the principle of a rate in aid which was objected to in Derbyshire. A great number of the old-fashioned cotton mills, which were worked by water power, had succeeded in keeping their hands employed upon the Indian cotton, and they naturally objected to being called on to pay a rate in aid of other mills, where, either the machinery was more expensive and could not be readily converted, or where, perhaps, equal efforts had not been made. It was worth while considering whether in the present emergency the same facility of borrowing money from the public funds should not be given to some of the most distressed unions which was extended to the landlords for the improvement of their estates shortly after the passing of the free-trade measures.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he wished to ask when it was intended to go into Committee on the Bill?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS: On Monday next.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH said, the interval proposed was much too limited.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, the Act, which it was proposed by the Bill to continue, expired on the 1st of March. He hoped the House would allow the Continuance Bill to be passed with as little delay as possible, and after the experience of a few months they would be in a better state to discuss the general question. If Monday was too soon, he hoped there would be no objection to fix Thursday next for going into Committee.

Bill read 2^d, and committed for Thursday next.

MALT DUTY BILL.—[BILL 20.]

SECOND READING.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

COLONEL BARTELOT said, that the necessity for bringing in a Bill of that character showed how necessary it was to do something with respect to the malt duties at large; for it showed how oppressively those duties worked, not only for the maltsters, but for the agricultural interest. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would only apply to the malt duties the principle which he had so successfully applied to so many other taxes—namely, reduction up to a certain point, the duty might rebound, in consequence of the relief, and the revenue be more than made up. Such a measure would stimulate the production of barley, and enable persons to malt it, which at present they could not do. He would not enter into the whole question of the malt tax, because he hoped that on a future day the subject would be fully discussed; but he would say, that if there was to be any remission of taxation, the agriculturists had some right to expect from the Chancellor of the Exchequer the favour with which he had already regarded the manufacturing interest. With regard to the Bill, the relief to the maltsters was not at all what they desired. It was proposed that they should pay interest at 4 per cent on the duties for malt made between April and October, but it was well known that they did not get the money for malt made during that period until after Christmas; and therefore they would be called on to pay interest at 4 per cent for three months on money which they had not received. It would be a hard case for them and of small benefit to the revenue. If any measure of relief were given it should be such a measure as would benefit the trade, and he hoped in the Budget the right hon. Gentleman would take into consideration the agricultural interest, which he had hitherto neglected.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he recollected going up with a deputation to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject, and he confessed that his right hon. Friend did not seem disposed to accept the suggestions then offered to him. He must have felt, however, that in reducing the credit from eighteen to six weeks he would so embarrass the small capitalist as to render it very difficult for him to carry on his business. Those who paid in the six weeks were called on to pay the duty before they got their malt into the market for sale, and they were also compelled to sell often when the market was very low to enable them to pay the duty. And when his right hon. Friend gave three months for the payment of the duty and asked 4 per cent interest, it was like asking men to pay interest on their own money, and in Committee he should oppose the charging of interest. The Bill was, no doubt, intended to give small relief, but from the conversation he had had with maltsters in Ware he gathered that they were of opinion that it afforded no relief comparatively to what they felt themselves entitled to. The whole question required consideration, and he hoped an opportunity would soon occur for discussing it.

MAJOR WINDSOR PARKER said, he fully concurred in the observations of the hon. Gentlemen who had spoken. Two years ago the table was literally covered with petitions from persons who felt themselves aggrieved by the oppressive nature of the malt tax. Farmers complained, and not without reason, that while, from time to time, other classes of the community received relief, while the paper duty was abolished, while the wine duties were reduced, and while the agriculturists in Sussex got the hop duty taken off—which he trusted was the prelude to the total abolition of the malt duty—the general agricultural body had received no corresponding benefit. The right hon. Gentleman now came forward with a miserable boon in the shape of an extension of the malt credits for six weeks on the understanding that the maltsters would pay 4 per cent interest. When the question of the abolition of the malt duties came before the House on some future occasion he believed that one of the most powerful arguments for that measure would be the usefulness of malt in fattening cattle.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped he should not be considered disrespectful if he did not enter on the general subject of the malt tax; but as they were promised a full discussion on a future day, he thought it better to reserve himself for that occasion. With respect to the particular provisions of the Bill, he concurred in the opinion that when they were in Committee it would be the best time to consider whether the relief proposed required further extension.

MR. WALPOLE said, their legislation on the subject was extraordinary. A few years ago they limited the period of the malt credits, and by that process, in the course of two years, £2,000,000 were obtained by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for purposes of revenue, which really ought to have been considered as capital and not as revenue. They now found themselves under the necessity of extending the period of the malt credit; and although they were extending the period, they charged interest to the maltster before he had got a return of his money. Therefore, they were doing very little benefit to the maltster by returning to a system which had been done away with a little too unguardedly.

MR. PULLER said, he thought it was not quite fair to confine the discussion to the merits of the Bill. It was perfectly true that in Committee was ordinarily the time to discuss particular clauses; but the Bill was of a peculiar character, and if in Committee they succeeded in altering it as to the payment of 4 per cent interest, the right hon. Gentleman, not being satisfied, could drop the measure. There was a point, however, on which he wished to set himself right with the House. In the course of the debate which took place on the first reading, he ventured to state that the result of the contraction of credit in 1859 and 1860 was to drive a considerable number of maltsters out of the trade. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not contradict him, but confined his speech entirely to the suggestion which had been made by the hon. Member for East Essex (Mr. Dodson). That hon. Member had stated that he (Mr. Puller) had been in error, for so far from there being a decrease in the number of maltsters, they had actually increased. He had taken the trouble to look into the Parliamentary statistics on the matter, and he found that they bore out the statement he had made. In 1859 the number of maltsters was 6,909, but in 1861 the number was 6,448, being a diminution of no less than 461. Turning to the main question, he could not but express his surprise that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he felt the injustice under which the maltsters suffered, and proposed to confer a certain amount of relief, should clog the boon with a charge of 4 per cent for the extension of time. The proposition was manifestly so unfair that it needed only to be stated to refute itself. Living as he did, near one of the greatest malting towns in England (Hertford), he had endeavoured, by communication with some of the leading members of the trade, to make himself master of the question; and the information which he possessed led him to the conclusion that nothing could be more unfair towards the maltsters than to impose a penalty of 4 per cent upon them for the proposed extension of credit.

MR. JACKSON said, he should support the course proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as it was the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to obtain the most he could obtain for the revenue. He could not see why the country should furnish capital to the maltsters to carry on their business. He thought the boon to the maltsters ample, and on commercial grounds he should object to any further extension of it.

MR. BENTINCK said, that as long as the malt duties existed, all talk about the prevalence of the principles of free trade was only a farce. It appeared to him, that on that side of the House there had been an expression of hope for which he feared there was little foundation, as well as on the part of some Members an expression of surprise at the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. What ground was there for ever hoping that the right hon. Gentleman would be the means of reducing the taxation which bore so heavily upon the rural districts of the country? The farmers had had only too much cause to complain of the injustice which they had experienced in financial matters at the hands of the right hon. Gentleman. As the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge had said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had contrived to alter the system of malt credits in such a way as to confer no benefit on those whose position it was proposed to improve. What was proposed was a most unfortunate system of legislation, for it would alter the system without conferring any benefit upon the sufferers under it. It was impossible to conceive any proposition, he might say, so absurd as that of asking a man to pay 4 per cent for money that was in the pocket of somebody else. He quite agreed that this was not the time for discussing the details of the measure, but he must say that it evinced most strongly the fact that the right hon. Gentleman had not abated one iota of that hostility which he had always shown to the rural districts of the country, and he hoped that on a future occasion the House would succeed in inducing the right hon. Gentleman to deal justly with the parties interested.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Monday next.

INSTRUCTION MOVED. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LORD NAAS said, he rose to move that it be an Instruction to the Committee to make provision for the registration of marriages in Ireland. A registration of marriage was quite as important as a registration of births and deaths. The Report of the Registrar General for England showed that the register of marriages was a complete barometer of the welfare of the people, and in all cases of property which depended on questions of legitimacy and descent it was of the greatest importance to have a complete system. In London alone last year there had been 1,178 searches into the marriage register, which showed how largely it was made use of by the people of this country, and what a benefit it was likely to be to the people of Ireland. Nothing was more common than for cases to occur in which the want of some such means of proving the legitimacy of children was painfully felt; for Irishmen frequently went abroad, and when they died out of the country, leaving property, great difficulty was often experienced by their representatives in establishing their claim. Many instances had come to his knowledge of property having been wholly lost to the rightful heirs in consequence of the absence of an authentic marriage record. The matter had been very fully inquired into by a Committee in 1861, and most important evidence was given as to the value of such a register. A system of registration should have nothing whatever to do with the question of the law of marriage, which many persons thought ought to be assimilated in the three kingdoms. Three plans had been proposed for the purpose of giving the country the great boon he sought to confer upon it. One, contained in Bills brought forward by himself and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, was that register books should be furnished to Roman Catholic clergymen, which should be forwarded to the Registrar General, through the local registrars. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr.

George) proposed another plan, imposing on all clergymen the duty of transmitting certificates of the marriages performed by them to the Registrar General, without the intervention of a superintendent registrar. A third plan was proposed by his right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell), and provided that Roman Catholic clergymen should transmit copies of the certificates to the Registrar General through a Roman Catholic diocesan ecclesiastic. Any one of those plans would effect the desired object. It would, perhaps, be wiser to leave the system at present in force as to the marriages of members of the Established Church and the marriages of members of Dissenting bodies as it existed, and merely provide for the registration of Roman Catholic marriages. That ought to be done in the manner most acceptable to the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church and to the Roman Catholic people at large, and he was persuaded that it was quite possible to do it without giving offence or imposing undue trouble on the parties concerned. He knew there was an impression abroad that the registry of Roman Catholic marriages might lead to a neglect of the religious ceremony, but he believed it would have quite the contrary effect, for he had known instances of persons who were married before the registrar merely for the purpose of availing themselves of the facilities of registration, which such a proceeding put within their reach. He was astonished at the timidity shown by his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary in declining to approach the subject, believing as he did that there would be no serious opposition to a proper system of registration of Roman Catholic marriages. The Bills which he (the noble Lord) and his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had already introduced had been lost merely on account of the pressure of business, and a dissolution of Parliament, and not because they had met with any serious opposition. The present was a most favourable occasion for taking up the subject once more, and he trusted that the opportunity would not be let slip.

MR. GEORGE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision in the Bill for the Registration of Marriages in Ireland."

MR. HADFIELD said, he was surprised to hear the noble Lord confine his Motion to the marriages of Roman Catholics.

LORD NAAS said, that the law already provided for the registration of marriages between members of the Establishment and of Protestant dissenters.

MR. HADFIELD would cordially support the Motion, but he wished to see the same privileges extended to members of all denominations.

MR. MONSELL said, his hon. Friend who had just sat down had fallen into a mistake. He had confounded the registration of marriages with an alteration of the marriage law. He entirely concurred with his noble Friend the Member for Cockermouth (Lord Naas) in thinking it advisable to deal with the registration of marriages and the operation of the marriage law as two separate questions. For the present they ought to confine themselves to the former. He did not think the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland ought to be accused of timidity for not having taken up the subject in connection with the registration of births and deaths; because, clearly, his wish was to avoid a matter which up to that time had excited a great deal of uneasy feeling in Ireland, arising from an apprehension that there was an intention of making an alteration in the marriage law. As to registration itself, no doubt there was an objection on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland to perform functions for the Government, and that could not be wondered at, seeing that they were not recognised by law; but he would remind the House, that after many attempts at legislation on the subject, a Marriage Registration Law was passed for Scotland in 1854. By the provisions of that Act parties contracting marriage were obliged, under penalty, to register their own marriage. Immediately after the ceremony a schedule obtained from the registrar was filled up by the clergyman, the parties, and witnesses; and, within three days, that schedule was sent to the registrar of the district, to be by him forwarded to the Registrar General. Since the Scottish system had been found to work so successfully, he thought it might, with advantage, be introduced into Ireland. The noble Lord referred to a suggestion he made in the Committee of having a Catholic ecclesiastic to which Catholic clergy should send certificates of the marriages solemnized by them. That might work well, but they had had no experience of it, while they had had experience of the Scotch system. They had already a system of registration of the Protestant marriages in Ireland, and it behoved them to provide for the registration of the marriages of Catholics, who comprised three-fourths of the population. He understood that one of the first measures of the new Pasha of Egypt had been to give orders for the registration of births, deaths, and marriages; and he trusted that, in that respect, Ireland would not be allowed to remain behind other civilized countries.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, and he would venture to repeat his advice to the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Peel) to persevere with his Bill for the registration of births and deaths, reserving to a future Session the question of the registration of marriages. He agreed in the proposition that it was desirable to have in Ireland a complete system of registration of marriages; but before they could effect that there was one obstacle which they must get rid of, and that was the law relating to mixed marriages in that country. That law would prevent the application of the Scotch system to Ireland, because the clergyman would have to sign the schedule; and if the marriage were a mixed marriage, he would be liable to a penalty. Moreover, he objected to the proposed mode of legislating on the subject. The Bill purported to provide for the registration of births and deaths, and it was moved that the Committee be instructed to insert provisions for the registration of marriages. Such a mode of legislation, he contended, was most objectionable.

MR. M'CANN said, he saw great difficulty in dealing with the subject of marriages in connection with the registration of births and deaths. There was no objection to the Bill as it stood; on the contrary, he believed it would give general satisfaction in Ireland.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he would admit that the time had come when there ought to be a registration of marriages in Ireland, but he thought the machinery of the present Bill was not suited to such registration. One of the best things the Irish Members could do would be to avail themselves of the example of Scotland. It was a mistake to suppose that the Catholics of Ireland were opposed to the registration of marriages; but the fact was that the existing marriage law was penal against Catholic clergymen. There might be cases where, in the cause of morality itself, a Catholic clergyman might be compelled to solemnize a marriage between two persons of different religious persuasions, and where, if he did not celebrate the marriage, the greatest injury might be done to the woman. In such a case, as the law now stood, it would be dangerous for the clergyman to register the marriage, because he would be registering his own condemnation. While, however, he adopted the principle of the noble Lord the Member for Cockermouth, he did not think it would be wise to push the House to a decision at the present time. Let the House pass the present Bill, and then the Government, if they so pleased, might introduce another for the registration of marriages, assured that they would not meet with any factious opposition from the Irish Members.

MR. BAGWELL said, he was anxious to see a registration of marriages, but he thought that was not an opportune time for proposing it. A system of registration in Ireland must be established by a distinct measure. To attempt to carry out that system by the Bill before them would, in his opinion, defeat the present measure. He trusted, therefore, that the right hon. Baronet would not adopt the suggestion of the noble Lord.

COLONEL DICKSON said, that no two men in the world were more capable of expressing the real feelings of the Roman Catholics of Ireland than the right hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) and the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire). Both agreed in the desirability of having a registration of marriages, and both denied that such a measure would be distasteful either to the Roman Catholic clergy or to the Roman Catholic laity in Ireland. The right hon. Member for Limerick had suggested a plan which would give satisfaction to all classes—namely, that the registration should be made by the parties interested in the marriage, and, for his own part, he could see no difficulty in so altering the Bill as to make it applicable to marriages as well as to births and deaths. Another argument in favour of dealing with marriages now was a pecuniary one. The Bill as it stood would entail great expense upon the counties of Ireland; and if we were to have another measure for the registration of marriages, the cost of the two would constitute a burden of no inconsiderable magnitude.

MR. M'MAHON said, he hoped that the noble Lord would press his Motion to a division, for the Bill as it stood was not worth the £16,000 a year which it would cost the country. If the Bill were delayed beyond Easter by including marriages in its provisions, so much the better, for the opinions of the country would thereby be ascertained. The law which made it penal for Roman Catholic priests to celebrate mixed marriages ought to be repealed, and the registration placed on the same footing as it was in England and Scotland.

MR. BUTT contended that they could not have registration in Ireland till the question of mixed marriages by the priest was settled, and that could not be settled till arrangements of a synod of Roman Catholics was adopted by the Legislature. A Roman Catholic priest might marry persons of his own persuasion in any place or at any hour; but if he attempted to celebrate what was called a mixed marriage, he was liable to be indicted for felony. That was too serious a state of things to be settled in the manner proposed by the noble Lord. The difficulty could never be got over till the validity of marriage was rendered independent of the religion of the parties. It was easy to deal with registration of births and deaths, very difficult to deal with the registration of marriages; and he therefore said, "Deal with the easy case at once, and make the difficult case easy as soon as you can."

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he would admit that it would be very important, if possible, to establish a registration of marriages in Ireland; but, looking merely at the discussion which had taken place that evening, the opinion of the House, he thought, was rather in favour of the Bill going on as at present framed than that he should introduce into it a subject which would require a material alteration in the machinery, and, he believed, render the measure impracticable. His noble Friend seemed to think he had showed timidity in dealing with the subject. Now, "he dared to do all that might become a man;" but if he were to undertake that subject, he believed he should meet with great opposition. His noble Friend on two or three occasions had attempted to legislate on the subject, and, through no fault of his own, but owing to the general feeling of the House, had signally failed. His noble Friend said that the proposal he made did not entail any alteration in the marriage law of Ireland; but he maintained most confidentially that it would. Looking at the present law of marriage in Ireland, it would be impossible to attempt to legislate on the subject without introducing into it very material alterations. His right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) said he must not, in treating the subject, confound alterations in the law of marriage with registration of marriages; but he differed from his right hon. Friend. At that moment Protestants and Presbyterian Dissenters in Ireland had great cause of grievance in consequence of the Act of 1844. It did not deal with the position of three-fourths of the population, the Roman Catholics of Ireland. They might not celebrate mixed marriages, but they could marry at any hour, in any place, without any registry, without any registrar being present. The Act of 1844 laid great restrictions on the Dissenting bodies, and they would never allow the removal of grievances affecting the Roman Catholics till their own were removed. Besides, he thought it would be unfair to endeavour to impose on the Roman Catholic body in Ireland a course of proceeding to which they said they had conscientious objections. His right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick said, if he proposed alterations, they would be accepted; but he did not think so. His right hon. Friend last year had himself presented a petition signed by twenty-seven of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Ireland, protesting against the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns). They stated—

“That your petitioners are willing to co-operate in every fair way with the State in making these registers available in courts of law, and even for statistical information; but they object to the legal imposition of such obligations as the Bill before your honourable House would enact. . . . It brings Roman Catholic marriages under the general provisions of the proposed Act, thereby subjecting such marriages to restrictions which Roman Catholics must hold the State to be incompetent to attach to the celebration of marriages, and creating penalties from which in the worse days of the penal laws Irish Catholics were free.”

There were restrictions which members of the Established Church were bound to submit to, and why should they exempt Roman Catholics from what they obliged Protestant ministers to regard, with respect to hours and places of celebration? Again, if he had proposed that the Roman Catholic clergy should send their returns to any except the Vicar General of their Church, they would not have assented. He believed it would be impossible to deal in one and the same Bill with the subject of the registration of marriages, and that of births and deaths. He felt very strongly on the subject. He hoped the House would not force on him the painful duty of placing obligations on Roman Catholics which they would conscientiously refuse to accept, and which might rouse agitating discussions in that House. That the Bill imposed a charge of £16,000 could not be for a moment compared with the advantages which it would confer, and could form no reasonable ground for opposing it. Precisely the same charge was levied upon the local rates in England and Scotland, and he could not understand why Ireland should be placed upon a different footing to those parts of the kingdom. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) said, that all the Dissenters of Ireland approved the Bill of the right hon. Member for Belfast; but that was not the case, as a large body of Protestant Dissenters in Ireland opposed it, and he had himself presented petitions of unimportant bodies in the north of Ireland. In order to show the difficulty of dealing with the subject, he would read to the House a history of the recent attempts at legislation in that direction:—Registration of Births, Deaths, and Marriages Bill, introduced by Lord Naas, read a first time 8th March, withdrawn 6th April, 1859, previous to dissolution of Parliament; ditto, introduced by Lord Naas, read a first time 8th May, and second time 17th May, 1860, withdrawn 5th July; ditto, introduced by Mr. Cardwell, read a first time 10th May, and second time 17th May, 1860, considered in Committee and reprinted 21st May, withdrawn 5th July; ditto, introduced by Mr. Cardwell, read a first time on the 11th of February, and second time 15th of April, 1861, referred to a Select Committee 15th April, reported 11th July, withdrawn 23rd July; ditto, introduced by Lord Naas, read a first time on the 22nd February, and second time on the 15th April, 1861, referred to the same Committee. Marriage Law Amendment Bill, introduced by Lord Chancellor Campbell, read a first time, in the Lords, 11th March, and second time on 23rd April, 1861, passed the Lords 4th of June; ditto, introduced by Sir Hugh Cairns, read a first time on the 24th of July, 1861. Marriages, Solemnization and Registration of, Bill, introduced by Sir Hugh Cairns, read a first time on the 19th February, and second time 12th March, 1862, considered in Committee 2nd April, withdrawn 2nd July. In the course of a brief period the noble Lord was courageous enough to propose three Bills, but all were withdrawn, and therefore he (Sir R. Peel) did not think he could fairly be accused of undue timidity in declining to deal with a subject involved in almost insuperable difficulty by including it in a measure for the registration of births and deaths, for which there existed adequate machinery.

MR. GEORGE observed that two of the Bills referred to by the right hon. Baronet had been referred to a Select Committee, who, after a careful inquiry, came to the conclusion that it was not only possible, but easy to adopt a mode of registration of marriages that would be acceptable to the great body of Roman Catholics, and to the clergy and laity of all denominations. Upon that Committee eight were Roman Catholics and seven Protestants, and by a majority of ten to four they adopted their report, the minority even being favourable to registration, but differing upon details. How, then, could it be said that there was any difficulty in dealing with the subject? He hoped the noble Lord would press his Motion to a division.

MR. HENNESSY said, he was very anxious, after what had fallen from the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary, to disclaim, on behalf of the Roman Catholics whom he represented, any intention to shirk the registration of their marriages. He believed, that on the contrary, they were desirous of having them properly and regularly registered; and that the right hon. Baronet had entirely misunderstood the purport of the Petition of the Roman Catholic Bishops to which he had referred. The right hon. Baronet had brought in one Bill for the registration of births and deaths, and another respecting illegitimate children, but none in relation to marriages. Indeed, to judge from the right hon. Gentleman's measures one would fancy that there were no such things as marriages in Ireland. Nobody in Ireland had any confidence in the Irish Government, and the Chief Secretary knew nothing about the country. He trusted the House would insist on improving this Bill.

MR. ESMONDE said, he should support

port the Bill as proposed by the Government.

MR. LEFROY said, he thought it would be a pity to endanger the passing of the Bill, which undoubtedly was important, by tacking on to it another proposition, which could not be carried out without considerable difficulty. The registration of marriages was a most important object; but it ought to form the subject of a separate measure.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he should support the instruction to the Committee, as every Roman Catholic Member who had spoken was in favour of a registration of marriages. The very Petition which the Chief Secretary had quoted showed that the hierarchy of that communion wished for such a registration, and were prepared to give it every assistance in their power; but they would not have their church or their religion interfered with. Without a scheme for the registration of marriages the Bill would be only a ridiculous system of statistical pedantry.

The House divided:—Ayes 66; Noes 89: Majority 23.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he would move that the Chairman report progress. He thought it very desirable that the Bill should be postponed until after the assizes in Ireland. He thought it most unfortunate that Bills relating to that country were generally brought forward when the majority of the Irish Members were absent.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

CONVICTS—CONVICT SUPERVISION IN DUBLIN.

PAPER MOVED FOR.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in moving for "Copy of Regulations with regard to the Supervision to be Exercised over the Convicts on Ticket of Leave in Dublin," said, that his chief object was to give to the noble Earl the President of the Council an opportunity of explaining a statement made the other evening which had led to some misapprehension. The noble Earl then stated that the supervision of the convicts liberated on tickets of leave, which had been applied generally in Ireland, was not enforced in the City of Dublin on account of the denseness of its population. He had no wish to go into a discussion of the relative merits of the English and Irish convict systems; but it was obvious that if the supervision, which was a distinguishing feature of the Irish system, could not be enforced in Dublin, there must be many portions of England to which it was not applicable. He thought the noble Earl was mistaken in that statement, and that it would lead to misapprehension. The fact, he believed to be, that while in the rural districts of Ireland monthly reports were made of the condition of the convicts, in Dublin the supervision was carried still further. Reports were made fortnightly, and an official was charged with the duty of paying frequent visits to the different convicts residing in the city and making reports on their conduct. The noble Earl concluded by moving for a Copy of the Regulations.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had made the statement, referred to by the noble Earl, on the authority of the Chief of the Police in London, who had been in communication with the police authorities in Ireland. That fact, as he understood, was, that there was no regular supervision exercised by the police over the convicts in Dublin, but that they were assembled fortnightly under the supervision of a gentleman who had undertaken that duty, and whose services seemed to have been productive of considerable good. The convict systems both in England and in Ireland would be fully considered by the Commission which was at present prosecuting its inquiries, and he trusted that such suggestions would be made as would have the effect of improving both systems.

Motion agreed to.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH moved,

"That an humble Address be presented to her Majesty for a Nominal List of Persons who have received a Remission of Sentence under the Terms of the Home Office Circular, 27th June, 1857, stating in each Case the original Sentence passed the Portion of such Sentence undergone by the Convict previous to his being discharged either in this Country or the Colonies, and in what Penitentiary Establishment; also a Nominal List of Persons discharged since the above-mentioned Circular who have been re-convicted, and the Sentence passed."

The noble Duke said, that a Circular had been issued recently from the Home Office in which the terms of a previous Circular of the year 1857 were considerably modified. The latter laid down a scale which was to be followed in remitting sentences of penal servitude. It was so difficult to obtain any reliable information as to how these remissions of sentences had worked, that he hoped there would be no objection to furnishing the Returns for which he moved, and which would show the number of persons who had received remission of sentence under that Circular. In the Returns already made, the numbers were stated in the aggregate—and the portions of sentence undergone were also given without reference to any particular individual. He was therefore anxious to obtain information of a more complete and minute description. By the present Returns it was almost impossible to trace the result of the system now in operation. The Circular of 1857 left much less discretion to the officials than that just issued; for in the latter the Home Secretary laid down a scale on which the officials were to be guided in the remission of sentences. The noble Earl near him (the Earl of Carnarvon) had shown, during the discussion of the subject of prison discipline yesterday, that there was great increase of crime in the year 1861 as compared with 1860. How far that increase was attributable to the remission of sentences under the terms of the Circular of 1857, and the re-conviction of the persons liberated, he could not say, but it was far from improbable that it was in some degree to be accounted for by the injudicious action of prison officials under the Circular. He would only mention one instance in which its terms had been departed from. The case of Redpath, to which he (the Duke of Marlborough) alluded on a previous occasion, exemplified the want of certainty in the remission of sentences. Redpath was convicted of forgery in 1857, and sentenced to transportation for life—a sentence which, by the Act of 1853, was equivalent to one of penal servitude for life. In 1858 he was despatched to Western Australia, contrary to the Act, which provided that no person who was removable from this country should be sent away until he had undergone eight years' penal servitude in this country. Five years had scarcely elapsed from his arrival in the colony before he was liberated, and, in the enjoyment of a revenue of £200 a year, lived in his own house and upon his own resources. In point of fact, he appeared to have only undergone one year of penal servitude. If there was any objection to give a nominal Return, a numerical Return might be given; what he wanted was that each case should be specified.

EARL GRANVILLE thought, that to be of any value, the Return asked for by the noble Duke must be nominal. He was informed that to prepare it in such a form would involve a great deal of trouble and take considerable time. He therefore hoped the noble Duke would not press his Motion.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that on the considerations stated by the noble Earl, he would postpone his application until after the Commission should have reported, when he would move for the Return if the information he wished for had not been called for by the Commission.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

POLAND.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I rise to ask, Whether the Government will lay upon the table any Despatch from the Consul General at Warsaw, in as far as it relates to the immediate Origin of the present Insurrection in Poland; also, to ask whether any Communication has been made by the Russian Government with respect to the Origin of the Insurrection, or by the Prussian Government with respect to any Engagement it may have entered into with a view to aiding the Russian Government in its Suppression? Your Lordships will observe that I only ask for information as to communications which may have been received from other Governments. I ask no question as to any communication which may have proceeded from Her Majesty's Government. If, however, they should feel themselves in a position to make any statement on the latter point, I have no doubt it will be received with satisfaction by your Lordships; but I am not asking for information with respect to their own proceedings, because there might be some inconvenience in affording it on this occasion. But, my Lords, I am sure of this, that whatever Her Majesty's Ministers may have said or done, the feelings excited in their breasts by the recent conduct of the Russians in Poland must be similar to those which have been excited in the breast of every English gentleman. I feel that I should display a want of candour, that I should be guilty of an offence against the Members of the Cabinet, if I expressed the slightest doubt of that. My Lords, the news of this insurrection in Poland was to all of us a subject of the most painful surprise. No doubt, nothing had occurred to lead us to expect such an ebullition of public feeling on the part of the Poles. On the contrary, the course of events during the last eighteen months had been, upon the whole, such as rather to lead us to hope that, on the whole, things were in a somewhat better state. Towards the end of the summer of 1861 the Russian Government sent a new Governor to Poland, with instructions of a most just and conciliatory character towards the Poles. At a somewhat later period the Emperor sent the Grand Duke Constantine to Poland, and his Imperial Highness, accompanied by his family, went there, in all probability with instructions in the same spirit. From these occurrences there seemed no doubt that the Emperor would attempt to conciliate the Poles, and it was hoped that some arrangement would be come to whereby something like Constitutional Government would be established in Poland. I believe the advice given by the friends of Poland was that the Poles should take the hand of friendship held out to them, show their willingness to co-operate with the Government, and accept all they could get. But it seems that while all this was going on, the police under the Russian Government were collecting information, or what they term information of the political opinions of every one in Poland capable of military service; and in the middle of the night of the 14th of January, without warning, by virtue of an order signed only at ten o'clock that night, Russian soldiers surrounded the domiciles and families of persons residing in Warsaw and forcibly took them from the midst of their families, without affording them any time to make preparations for a separation, perhaps for life, from all that belonged to them. It is to be observed, my Lords, that the men seized under that conscription were not those who were fittest for military service, but those who from their political opinions seemed to the Russian police fittest to be consigned to the Russian army for life. My Lords, the feeling of the people of Warsaw and of the people of Poland was one of utter despair. Those who could escape betook themselves to the woods, and a feeling of despair led them at once to resist the armed force of Russia. My Lords, they had not time for reflection—their feeling was that of unutterable despair—but, had time been afforded to them, they could have come to no other resolution than that which uncalculating despair suggested. There was no longer security for any man in the midst of his family. In many cases men were selected as soldiers for the purpose of gratifying private animosity, as might have been done in former times in the State of Venice. It was a blow at the nation, and the nation has risen to avenge it. I recollect that when the revolution broke out in France, a Minister of great candour and straightforwardness, and who knew the circumstances which had led to it, expressed his opinion in this House that the revolution was provoked. My Lords, I trust there is a similar spirit and candour in Her Majesty's present Government. If they really believe the circumstances occurred in Warsaw which we are told led to the insurrection, I do hope they will come forward and declare that the Government think the insurrection was provoked, and thus place themselves where the Government of the country ought to be—at the head of public opinion. My Lords, let us observe what has occurred in consequence of the insurrection provoked by the conduct of the Russians. At the present moment Russia cannot be considered any longer as in Europe. A few years ago England and France and Piedmont combined together to bar the passage of Russia to the Bosphorus. They succeeded in that object, and Russia has now barred herself from Europe on the north-east—her frontier is practically thrown back to the Niemen. It would be impossible for her to lead her troops through Poland; and, owing to the condition of that country, it is almost certain that such a state of things must continue for a considerable time. She has not only to reconcile to herself the Poles, but she must also reconcile to herself the public opinion of all Europe. Depend upon it, my Lords, that the sullen murmurs of the public reprobation of all the nations of Europe must have made themselves heard in Petersburg. Look around and see in what quarter we have reason to apprehend the consequences. We can look back and recollect during how many years the Poles fought gallantly in the ranks of the French army. As long as there exists in France a sense of military honour—as long as there remains the memory of the brilliant deeds of the Poles, of the courage and daring of that noble brotherhood in arms which led them to the last, under the most untoward and disastrous circumstances, to stand in unbroken ranks round the colours they had chosen—as long as this remains, France must be in heart with Poland. And the Emperor of the French—who is most sensitive to observe and to apprehend every change in public opinion—it is impossible for him not to observe what are the sentiments of the French people and the French army; and these must soon become the sentiments of the Emperor. Austria, my Lords, has throughout acted loyally, according to the principles of International Law, and neither Russia nor any other Power, as far as I am aware, can by possibility attach blame to her for her conduct. But what are we to say of Prussia? It is but a few weeks ago that the King of Prussia summoned his army and his people to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the call of their King to the field, when, in 1813, the whole nation sprang to arms, and Prussia marched by the side of the Allies to Paris. My Lords, it was not the summons of the King alone which led them to take that course—it had already been adopted by a portion of the army. That movement arose from a feeling of resentment which it was impossible to control when the Prussians looked back at the indignities and suffering to which the French had subjected them. They rose then to redeem the honour of their country: they rose to demand for themselves the position and the rights of an independent people. And, my Lords, can it be expected by any Sovereign, however medieval his notions of Government may be, that those who now represent the Prussian army will allow themselves to be moved to the Polish frontier for the purpose of repressing every principle and every feeling which they had at heart in 1813, and the assertion of which has obtained for them the higher rank they have since maintained in Europe? Prussia owes that she is a nation—that her army is respected among those of Europe—she owes everything she has of honour and independence to her having acted upon the very principles and been incited by the very feelings which she is now, I fear, called upon to attack on the Polish frontier. My Lords, that cannot be. It is contrary to nature—it is contrary to the feelings of nations and of armies; and if the King of Prussia should add to all the various acts which have so irritated his people and his Parliament an attempt to trample through the army upon the very principles to which he owes the independence and the honour of his country, there will arise a crisis in that kingdom—a mighty reaction—which may extend yet further, and may again disorganize all the States of Europe. I do not pretend to entertain any peculiar views respecting the causes which may have given rise to the great events now transpiring in Poland. But I have an enduring reliance upon the general beneficence of that Providence from which all these great events must spring; and, looking at the inscrutable manner in which Providence effects its purposes, bringing good out of evil—dreadful as the view is which we now have of the state of things in Poland, and of this horrible war in which both parties destroy, and both are believed to massacre—whatever may be the miseries now inflicted upon Poland—I will entertain the hope that this is the commencement of a brighter era, and that even we may live to see that which has been the object of all Statesmen for the last eighty years—the re-establishment, if not in its integrity, at least in strength, under a constitutional Government, of the noble nation of the Poles.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, in answer to the noble Earl, I shall confine myself as far as possible to the facts of the case as far as they are known to me, and shall abstain as much as possible, with the exception of one part of the observations which he has made, from the expression of opinions respecting what is now going on in Poland. In the first place, I will say that I cannot, consistently with my duty, give the report from our Consul General at Warsaw, because I consider that while these events are transpiring the production of these reports would make the position of the Consul one of extreme difficulty, and would render it almost impossible for him to give information, and to describe the course of things in Poland, without encountering violent opposition from one or other of the parties. With regard to the present outbreak, I must say I do not think it was so sudden and so unexpected an event as the noble Earl seems to suppose—at least to those who were in the habit of receiving accounts of what was going on in Poland. Your Lordships will recollect that last year there were in Warsaw great demonstrations, the churches being filled at times with men and women singing patriotic hymns, these demonstrations, however, being unaccompanied by any breach of the peace. But it was impossible that they could have continued for a long time without either producing, on the part of the Government and the Emperor of Russia, an inclination to accede to the wishes of the Poles at Warsaw, or without leading to violent measures from those who took part in these demonstrations. Now, my Lords, in considering the affairs of Poland, we may divide the population of the country into three different classes. One portion, consisting of the landed aristocracy, the great owners of the soil, many of them enlightened men, engaged in the cultivation and improvement of their estates, and in improving the condition of the people living on those estates, were but little disposed to favour any act of revolution. Another portion of the people of Poland consists of the middle classes in the towns, both those belonging to the upper part of the middle classes and the shopkeepers and others who belong to the lower part of the middle classes. The other portion of the population of Poland consists of the peasantry. When the demonstrations, to which I have alluded, ceased, there was a great difference in the course taken by these different classes of the population. The great landowners were determined, if possible, to bring their grievances to the foot of the throne, but they were determined, at the same time, not to break out into any act of violence, and not to use force for the accomplishment of their objects. Those objects were, according to my information, the right of constitutional government, the right to have representatives, and to have a Polish Administration, or an enlightened Administration, consisting chiefly of Poles, favour to the religion of their country, and the encouragement of the study of the language of their country. With regard to the last of these objects, they were in agreement with the intentions of the Emperor. Heretofore, in the history of Poland, it has been the object of the Russian Government to root out the language of the country, and to deter the Poles from the exercise of the Roman Catholic religion. The present Emperor, on the contrary, was understood to favour the national development of Poland, and his wishes and views with regard to the Government of Poland were described as, to a great extent, most enlightened. These persons, then, belonging to the landed aristocracy of Poland, met together, and in conformity, as they believed, with the wishes of the Emperor and of the Grand Duke Constantine, they prepared an address in which they, in the first place, stated their wish that Poland should be enlarged by the addition of certain provinces now under the Russian rule, which, since the first partition in 1772, had been separated altogether from Poland; and, in the second place, they asked for constitutional Government. Their wishes, in these respects, were not different from those entertained by Alexander I. of Russia, and were not inconsistent with the general provisions of the Treaty of Vienna, in framing which the Emperor took so large a part, and over which he exercised so considerable an influence. When, however, this address, signed by more than 200 of the chief landed proprietors in Poland, was presented, the persons who so presented it were told that they had committed a grave offence against the State, and Count Zamayski, who had been the medium of its presentation, was told that he had taken a step which was inconsistent with the law and with the policy of the Emperor, and that it was requisite for the internal peace of Poland that he should quit the country. Accordingly, he quitted Russia and came to England. While here he was informed that his wife, whom he had left behind him, was at the point of death. Upon this he applied for permission to visit his dying wife; but—owing, I am bound to say, to some mistake—the telegraphic despatch sent never reached its destination, and therefore he received no answer to his application. It had always been attempted, on the part of the aristocracy of Poland, to obtain a representative constitution, and to establish a liberal government which would be entirely consistent with loyalty towards the Emperor of Russia; but, in this instance, the attempt came to an end in the manner I have described. I now come to the second portion of the Polish population, consisting of the middle classes. They were in despair at finding that no improvement in the administration of the country resulted from the efforts of those who were sent to improve it; and they therefore formed themselves, in Warsaw especially, into secret societies, among whose members were persons entertaining the most extreme views on social and political questions, partaking to some extent, I believe, of the opinions held by M. Mazzini. My Lords, it was open to the Russian Government, of course, to have used their utmost vigilance in repressing these secret societies, giving to the members of them a fair trial, and, if necessary, severe punishment; but, at the same time, the Emperor might have continued and enlarged his plans for the improvement of his administration in Poland, and might thus have showed that under the Russian Government happiness was still within the reach of the Polish people. Unfortunately, this was not the course taken by the Government of Russia; and the Emperor, under the advice—this, at least, is the general belief—of a very distinguished Pole, Count Wielopolski, who had been placed under the Grand Duke at Warsaw, came to a different conclusion. I will not attempt to repeat the account of that which the noble Earl described in his own graphic and impressive manner as the effect of the conscription. Certain it is that the measure of conscription which was carried through by the Government of Poland was of the most severe character, and such as to excite the unhappy population to despair. A conscription is of itself a measure of great severity upon the population. It condemns a man, who has no wish to embark in the military profession, to banishment from home, and to all the privations of a military life, if the lot should fall upon him. Seeing that the measure itself is one of such severity, the Sovereigns of those countries, where it is in force, have introduced such modifications of the law as make it tolerable to the population and modify its severity beyond what the necessity of the case might require. And the Russian Government itself, by the laws of 1859, had introduced a system by which it was provided that so many should be chosen out of every 100, or out of every 1,000, such choice being made justly and fairly, and substitutes were allowed for those who had fair ground for exemption. Instead of taking the legal course, the Government of Poland ordered in the first instance that the whole conscription should be levied upon the towns, in which they considered the spirit of insurrection chiefly to prevail, and that it should not be levied in the country parts, where the peasantry were supposed to be less disaffected. That of itself was a great injustice. But they went beyond this, and not only ordered that the whole number of conscripts should be taken from the towns, but also that from certain lists of names which, as the noble Earl has stated, were supplied by the police, those persons contained in those lists, without trial or examination, were to be presumed to be guilty of disloyalty, and were to be seized and carried away to serve as soldiers, although they were not fairly liable to be placed upon the lists of conscripts. The feeling produced by such a measure may be imagined. The persons who were engaged in secret societies, who meant to rise in insurrection at some time, although probably they would never have carried out that intention, were driven to despair; they thought that if they must serve as soldiers they would rather shed the last drop of their blood upon their native land of Poland than waste their lives in distant lands in the service of Russia. Those who were not engaged in conspiracies were struck with alarm lest they might be suspected, and thus they at once fled from the towns and determined to risk their lives in insurrection. Well, my Lords, this measure, although it was not a measure taken with a population that was perfectly tranquil and well affected, yet it was a measure which, I think, no British Minister would venture to justify. In conversation with the Russian Minister, and in writing to Her Majesty's Ambassador, I could not forbear to express my opinion that it was the most imprudent and the most unjust step the Russian Government could take. With regard to the second part of the noble Earl's question, which relates to the communications with respect to the engagements by which the Prussian Government has bound itself to lend its assistance in certain events to the Russian Government to repress the insurrection, I have had conversations both with the Russian and the Prussian Ambassadors upon the subject, but they have not furnished me with a copy of the convention; indeed, they informed me they had no such copy. But they have informed me generally of the nature of that convention. The Russian Ambassador told me to day that it was not a convention, on the part of Prussia for the purpose of suppressing the insurrection in Poland; but I understood from him and from the Prussian Ambassador that the purport of the convention was, that instead of Prussia remaining perfectly neutral—in which case Russian soldiers either taking refuge from insurgents or being in pursuit of insurgents, if they should touch upon Prussian territory, would be disarmed and kept disarmed as long as they remained upon Prussian territory—they have agreed that Russian soldiers, when taking refuge upon Prussian soil, should retain their arms, and if pursuing Polish insurgents they should be permitted to pursue them, and take them prisoners if they can, upon Prussian territory. I understand also that the engagement is reciprocal, and that, if any insurrection should occur in the Polish provinces of Prussia, the Prussian soldiers would be allowed to pursue the insurgents in Russian Poland, and take prisoners any insurgents they might be able to find there. Those are, as far as I can understand from verbal communication, the engagements now existing between Prussia and Russia. As to Austria, the Ambassador of Austria has read to me a despatch showing the policy of the Austrian Government, and of which I can give your Lordships an outline. The Austrian Government declared they would take no part with regard to the Polish insurrection, but that they would strictly comply with all their engagements with Russia—that they will not permit arms or ammunition to cross the frontier, nor persons in arms as insurgents to take advantage of any shelter in Austria in order to make an attack upon the Russian provinces of Poland. But, beyond this, the Austrian Government takes no measures such as those I have mentioned in the other case. The Austrian Government declared, in the name of the Emperor, that it is his wish that his subjects in Galicia should enjoy all the privileges which they have at present; that he will not send any more troops into Galicia than were there before the breaking-out of the insurrection, but will rely entirely upon the fidelity of the people. I could not help observing to the Prussian Ambassador that, in my opinion, the Prussian Government, by taking any share in the suppression of the insurrection, does in some way make itself responsible after the fact for the measures of conscription that have been adopted. I have now stated to your Lordships all that I can at present detail. As to any advice to be given, that must be a matter of most serious deliberation. I do not know at present the whole extent of the objects and scope of the insurrection. We do not know whether it may not be a mere movement of despair, against which the influence of property may be successfully brought to bear, or whether, on the other hand, it may not extend further, and become a national movement. Under these circumstances, I must decline to produce at present the papers to which the noble Earl has referred.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY:—I do not clearly understand from the noble Earl whether, if insurgents took refuge without being pursued, they are to be given up by the Prussian Government to the Russian Government. I cannot sit down without expressing my sincere sorrow at what I have heard to be the attitude of the Prussian Government.

EARL RUSSELL:—I have not been informed that there is any article or stipulation with regard to unarmed refugees.

BILL [H.L.].

A Bill to amend the Law enabling Boards of Guardians to recover Costs of Maintenance of Illegitimate Children in certain Cases in Ireland—Was presented by The Viscount LIFFORD; read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 12.)

RESIGNATION OF SIR WILLIAM ARMSTRONG.—QUESTION.

MR. LAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House a Copy of any Correspondence that has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and Sir William Armstrong as to resigning his appointment; of any Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government, Sir William Armstrong, and the Elswick Ordnance Company as to the termination of the contract between the Government and that firm; and of any agreement or arrangement entered into for the Valuation of Plant, or otherwise, connected with the Elswick Works?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, in reply, said, he was ready to produce the correspondence with Sir William Armstrong; but, as that with the Elswick Company was not complete, he could not agree to lay it upon the table.

THE IRISH CENSUS.

QUESTION.

MR. W. O. GORE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the detailed report of the late Census in Ireland will be printed?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied that he had been informed by the Registrar General for Ireland that the first part of the details would be ready to be presented to Parliament in the month of April, and the remainder in the following month.

PUBLIC SUBSCRIPTIONS.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he proposes to take any steps to ascertain the wishes of the Subscribers to the Funds which have lately been raised to relieve the sufferers in India, in the Crimea (the Nightingale Fund), the Hartley Colliery Fund, and others, with a view to bestowing the surplus on other sufferers by calamities which were similar in their nature?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, that as these funds had been raised by voluntary contributions for specific purposes, and placed by the subscribers in the hands of Committees or Trustees, it would be obviously improper for the Government even to appear to assume a right to deal with them. If there was any surplus after meeting the objects for which any of them were raised, its disposition, of course, would rest with the Committee or Trustees.

TICKETS OF LEAVE.

QUESTION.

MR. DENMAN said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any instructions have recently been issued with reference to the revocation of Tickets of Leave for infringement of the conditions endorsed thereon?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had a few nights ago stated, in reply to a similar question asked by another hon. Member, that the only instructions which had been given with reference to this subject were that certain officers of the metropolitan police should see the convicts before they left Milbank, with a view to facilitate their identification. Those instructions were part of a general arrangement which had been contemplated by the Government, but which had been suspended during the sitting of the Royal Commission on the subject, in order that the recommendations of that Commission might first be known.

THE NAVY—APPOINTMENT OF MR. REED.—QUESTION.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether there is any truth in the report that it is contemplated, in the event of the resignation of Mr. Isaac Watts, C.B., Chief Constructor of the Navy, to appoint to that important office a gentleman over the heads of Mr. Abethell, Mr. Oliver Lang, and other distinguished and talented master shipwrights of long standing in Her Majesty's service?

Lord CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that it was the intention of the Admiralty to appoint Mr. Reed as Chief Constructor of the Navy. That gentleman had recently been employed in the construction of a vessel according to his own invention, and had done his work extremely well. He was originally brought up in the School of Naval Architecture, and would be, in every respect, a proper successor to Mr. Watts. No reflection was intended to be cast upon the character and ability of the excellent officers to whom his hon. and gallant Friend had alluded. The duties of the Chief Constructor required for their performance a man of very active habits, and those gentlemen, although very eminent, were rather old.

VISCOUNT SYDNEY AND MR. BUDDEN.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, while he was up he would ask the permission of the House to make a statement which he had been asked to make by the Lord Lieutenant of Kent (Viscount Sydney) in reference to observations which fell on the previous evening from the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire (Lord Robert Montagu). The noble Lord stated to the House that a certain gentleman at Chatham, named Budden, was appointed to a captaincy in the Kent Volunteers in consequence of an application from him (Lord C. Paget), and in consequence of his having given a dinner to him (Lord C. Paget) at Chatham. The Lord Lieutenant was very anxious that that misstatement should be rectified. He (Lord C. Paget) had made no application to the Lord Lieutenant. He (Lord C. Paget) knew nothing of Mr. Budden, beyond that he was a highly respectable gentleman belonging to Chatham. He did not know that he was connected with the Volunteers. Lord Sydney stated that he was originally applied to by a deputation headed by the clerk of the peace, to appoint Mr. Budden to a captaincy to command the local corps. It happened, however, that Mr. Budden was employed under the Government in reference to can- teens, and Lord Sydney, therefore, thought it desirable that he should not be appointed to a captaincy. Subsequently, however, Mr. Budden became High Constable of Chatham, and Lord Sydney was again applied to, he (Lord C. Paget) believed by all parties—of all sorts of politics—to give the appointment to him. The office of high constable was, he believed, equivalent to that of mayor. Lord Sydney, under these circumstances, gave the appointment to Mr. Budden, on the earnest recommendation of the townspeople. Lord Sydney wished it to be stated that he never had received any request for the appointment from him (Lord C. Paget), and he could only give his word of honour that he never applied to Lord Sydney in reference to Mr. Budden. Connected with the same matter there was another statement which, coming from the quarter it did, he might perhaps pass unnoticed. He (Lord C. Paget) was accused of having gone down to a dinner at Chatham for political purposes—

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord (Lord R. Montagu) to whose statements the noble Lord is referring, is absent, and it is the practice of the House not to allow statements to be made to which the Gentleman charged has no opportunity of reply.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I can only state that I went to a dinner—

MR. SPEAKER: I think the noble Lord must not continue.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that in obedience to the ruling of the right hon. Gentleman, he would take another opportunity of referring to the matter.

STATE OF NEW ZEALAND.

QUESTION.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether there is any truth in the report that Sir George Grey has tendered his resignation of the Government of New Zealand, unless more troops are sent there?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the report was entirely without foundation. Sir George Grey had not applied for more troops. The prospects of peace in New Zealand, he was glad to say, had improved, and were improving.

GAME LAWS (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

MR. HASSARD said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If his attention has been called to the 4th section of the Act 27 Geo. III. (Ireland), c. 35, which prohibits any person from buying or selling a hare between the first Monday in November and the first Monday in July, and if he intends to take any steps to amend said Act?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the clause had been submitted to the Law Officers, but he had not yet received their Report.

THE TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can inform the House when the Commission on Transportation and Secondary Punishments is likely to make its Report?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it was impossible for him to give any information as to the time when the Commission on Transportation and Secondary Punishments was likely to make its Report. The Commission was prosecuting its inquiry with due diligence, and he had no reason to suppose there would be any delay in presenting the Report, nor did he think the inquiry would be very protracted.

TENURE OF LAND.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Why a Return, moved for on the 1st of August, as to the Tenure and Improvement of Land Act, has not been presented?

SIR ROBERT PEEL replied, that it was necessary that the Orders should be moved again this Session. As soon as that was done, the Return would be produced.

UNDERGROUND RAILWAYS.

QUESTION

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the attention of Government has been directed to the effect of Underground Railways in the Metropolis on buildings in the neighbourhood of the lines, and whether the Government will take the subject into their consideration?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, it was presumed that Parliament, when it passed a Railway Act, inserted such clauses as were necessary for the protection of public and private interests. He supposed that parties injured would still have a right to maintain an action for damages. That, however, was a question which ought more properly to be addressed to his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General.

THE GALWAY CONTRACT.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the Papers with reference to the renewal of the Galway Contract will be laid upon the table; and has the Government been apprised of any proposal on the part of the Atlantic Royal Mail Company to make, not Galway, but Liverpool or some other English port, the point of departure and arrival of their steamers?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the correspondence between the Government and the Atlantic Royal Mail Company was already printed, and would be distributed immediately. The intention attributed to the Atlantic Royal Mail Company of sailing from an English port could only be expressed in the form of a proposal, inasmuch as it would introduce a feature altogether novel into the Contract, and he had not heard of any such proposal. A letter, however, had been received from a gentleman connected with the Inman line of steamers, stating that he had reason to believe the Company contemplated some plan of the kind. He had no authentic knowledge on the point, and only mentioned the circumstance to show that the Government were not keeping back anything within their cognizance.

POLAND—CONVENTION BETWEEN

QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether any reliable account has been received of a Convention said to have been concluded between the Governments of Russia and of Prussia respecting the present state of affairs in Poland; and whether, in such a case, there would be any objection to communicate such information to the House?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—I believe, Sir, that some agreement has been entered into between the Russian and Prussian Governments with reference to the present state of affairs in Poland; and we are informed that the agreement goes to this extent, that the troops of one party shall be at liberty to pursue insurgents into the territory of the other, and that railway accommodation shall be afforded in case of need. I do not believe that the arrangement extends to the employment of force by one party in co-operation with the other. But we have not got the agreement, and all I know is the general report which I have mentioned.

WEST INDIES.—QUESTION.

MR. CAVE said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Why a Paper respecting certain offices in the West Indies, ordered last March, had not been laid on the table, and when it is likely to be produced?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE, in reply, said, delay had arisen because the Paper necessitated reference to the West Indies. It was now ready, and would be presented immediately.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LABOUR IN EGYPT—POLAND.
QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to put a Question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, in the interests of humanity. They gave their sympathy freely to residents in the Valley of the Mississippi; why should they refuse it to inhabitants of the region of the Nile? Forced labour was the great evil and curse of that country. It was slavery in its worst form, because the slaveowner had a direct interest in the health and well-being of his slave, whereas a ruler with despotic power obtained labour on his own terms, and was troubled with no responsibility as to the maintenance of the wretched people who were brought in chains to perform his tasks from a distance of from 200 to 500 miles. They were brought from the cataracts to the Delta of the Nile with cruel severity and compulsion. The new Pasha of Egypt, however, had announced his intention of abolishing forced labour there. But from the extensive works going on at the Suez Canal, and from the abundant supply of workmen which the system of forced labour procured, it was feared that the influence of France would be employed against the course announced by the Pasha. The French Government, there was little doubt, would be solicited by the shareholders of the Suez Canal to do all in their power to forward that undertaking, and to prevent the adoption of any course which would interfere with its progress. He wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government will afford their support to Ismail Pasha in the execution of his declared intention to abolish forced labour in Egypt?

VOL. CLXIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the Question of the hon. Gentleman, as I understand it, is, whether the present Pasha of Egypt has issued, or is about to issue, a decree to prohibit the employment of forced labour in Egypt, and whether that measure has the sanction, and, so far as may be proper, the support of Her Majesty's Government. We understand that the present Pasha, as soon as he came into authority, announced his intention of abolishing altogether the system of forced labour in Egypt; and, undoubtedly, the opinion of Her Majesty's Government is, that it is a very proper measure, that it is only extending to Egypt that rule which, ever since the accession of the late Sultan, has been the law of Turkey, and that its impartial application would be very desirable in Egypt. Such a measure would relieve the population of that country from a tax which presses very heavily upon them, and would contribute very much to the agricultural prosperity of Egypt, because a great number of people are taken away from their private affairs and from the cultivation of their fields, and of course the districts from which they come are left destitute of that labour which is essential for their proper tillage and cultivation. Therefore my answer is, so far as it may be proper for Her Majesty's Government to interfere in a matter which relates entirely to the internal arrangements of the Turkish empire, that it is our opinion that the intended measure of the Pasha is a humane, a just, and a proper measure, and is calculated to extend to the people of Egypt the same relief from compulsory labour which has, for a great number of years, been extended to the people in other parts of the Turkish empire.

POLAND—CONGRESS OF PARIS, 1856.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON.: While I am on my legs, perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman) would allow me to answer by anticipation a Question which he has given notice he would put to me, and which if I waited to answer late at night, the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. D. Griffith) might not then be in his place to hear my answer to his Question. My hon. Friend proposes to ask me whether Her Majesty's Government would produce any correspondence on the subject of Poland which took place between the Earl of Clarendon when he was employed at the Congress of Paris in 1856 and Her Majesty's Government. There was only one despatch received by the Earl of Clarendon at that time, and Her Majesty's Government have no objection to produce it if my hon. Friend will move for it.

CARRIAGE ROAD THROUGH HYDE PARK. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he had a Question to put to the First Commissioner of Works which was of importance to the inhabitants of the metropolis. The right hon. Gentleman last year introduced a measure to open a communication through Hyde Park between Bayswater and Kensington. His plan, however, met with serious opposition. There were financial difficulties in the way, because the road would cost £7,000; and engineering difficulties and difficulties of time, because it was clearly demonstrated by the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) that the road would not be ready when the Great Exhibition was opened. His right hon. Friend withdrew his proposal, and brought forward another plan, which had the great advantage of costing only £2,000, and was readily made. That road combined the maximum of convenience to those who used it with the minimum of inconvenience either to foot-passengers in the Park or equestrians in Rotten Row. The close of the Exhibition brought with it the close of the road; but he was bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman kept faith with the House, because he had very distinctly refused to hold out any hope of continuing to keep the road open. He would now ask his right hon. Friend, Whether he would not reconsider his decision of last year, and permit the road to be again opened; because he believed the advantageous results of last year would be again realized, and that it would be of the greatest accommodation to the inhabitants of Bayswater and Kensington to have that means of communication open?

MR. COWPER said, he had long felt the amount of communication between the populous districts of Bayswater and Paddington on the north of the Park, and South Kensington and Chelsea on the south, to be such as urgently to require a public road; and that the concession of such a road was a question of time. It could not be expected that this increasing population would be long content to perambulate the eastern boundary of the Park and thus add two miles unnecessarily to their journeys. When the subject was first pressed upon his attention, he felt so much the importance of preventing business traffic from encroaching upon those parts of the Park which were set apart for the recreation of the people that he endeavoured to arrange that a road should be made, altogether distinct and separate from the other portions of the Park, and it was with that view that he proposed the plan to which his noble Friend had alluded, and which was brought before the House in the month of February last year. But there were many difficulties in adopting any permanent road at that moment, and it was almost impossible to get any plan carried into effect in time for the opening of the Exhibition on the 1st of May. He was therefore induced to adopt the alternative of opening a temporary road by appropriating a portion of the Serpentine Bridge and of Rotten Row to the use of carriages. He was entirely satisfied with the result of that experiment. His noble Friend only expressed the general opinion of those who frequented the Park when he said that the road provided what was wanted, without serious inconvenience to anybody. Now, therefore, that the subject must be again considered, they could not, in his opinion, do better than adopt the same line which experience had shown to answer so well. He would remind the House that he was asked, towards the close of last Session, by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto), whether he should continue the temporary road, and he stated, in reply, that he considered himself pledged to shut it up at the close of the Exhibition, and to that pledge he had most scrupulously adhered. Now, that the matter was again opened for consideration, he was quite prepared to say, that when the repairs should be completed which were now going on on the Serpentine Bridge, which required a coating of asphalt to prevent percolation of the water through the arches, it was his intention to re-open the public road in the same direction in which it ran last year, and he believed that road would provide the accommodation required with the least possible alteration in the general arrangement of the Park, and with the smallest possible impediments to future alterations and improvements. The surface of the road had not been changed; all that had been done was that the wire fence which the Messrs.

Morton, of Liverpool, had kindly lent for use during the Exhibition was taken away. It would now be necessary to put up the ordinary fence; but when that was done the road would be opened to hired cabs and carriages, but neither carts, omnibuses, nor other heavy traffic would be allowed to make use of it.

DISTRESS IN THE COTTON DISTRICTS.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the distress existing in the manufacturing districts, and to move an Address to Her Majesty praying that a Royal Commission may be issued to consider the best mode of obtaining a permanent supply of Cotton. From the statements which had been made in the House it would be seen that the distress in the manufacturing districts, which had prevailed now for so many months, was approaching so serious a height that it might be almost called a national calamity, and sooner or later must be dealt with as such. It had been stated in that House that during the last six months 500,000 persons had received relief, one half from voluntary contributions and the other half from the rates. It had also been stated that the voluntary contributions amounted to £1,400,000; that there had been borrowed on security of the rates in different unions £63,675, and all this was independent of an immense amount of private and local charity. From Australia alone had been received a sum of £46,630. It had been asserted that in the Union of Rochdale one out of every five of the inhabitants was receiving relief, and they had the evidence of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Potter), the President of the Chamber of Commerce at Manchester, to the effect that in the Glossop Union the rates had risen from £1,000 a year to £1,000 per week; while the entire rental of the union was only £65,000. That was approaching a state of things described by an hon. Member of that House during the Irish famine, when the poor rates in some districts amounted to 20s. in the pound. It had been also stated by the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) that the sums received in the cotton districts for the relief of the distress amounted to £320,000, besides private contributions from millowners, to which must be added the loss of capital invested in mills and machinery, and the loss of wages to operatives, amounting, after making certain deductions, to no less a sum than £6,000,000. Did any hon. Member believe that Lancashire could bear, for one or two years longer, such a vast drain on its resources? It was obvious that some other remedy for the distress must be sought for than that which had been hitherto applied, for as the poor rate was raised the distress was added to; and thus in the Oldham Union 4,000 persons had been changed from ratepayers to rate-receivers. The Times newspaper, from which they took inspiration, had directed attention to this question, and had intimated that something else must be done besides feeding hungry men from borrowed money. He did not think that they could possibly expect another sum of £46,000 from Australia, or that this country would subscribe in another year such large sums as it had done in the present. He did not mean to say that sympathy for the operatives would be less, or that the admiration for their patience and forbearance in the sad struggle would be diminished; but facts were facts, and they could not always expect to see the labourers in Devonshire and Cornwall, who only received 10s. a week, coming down from their distant villages to the parish church to contribute to the maintenance of the Lancashire operatives. Nor, on the other hand, if they turned to the prospect of the cotton supply, could they find any grounds for hope. In 1861 they obtained from America 1,841,600 bales of cotton; in 1862 they obtained 717,666 bales; but it was estimated that during the present year they would not obtain more than 7,000. In 1861 they obtained from all sources 3,329,700 bales; in 1862 they obtained 21,234,316, and the estimated supply in this year was 2,343,900, being very little more than was imported at a time when they were not suffering from a deficient supply of cotton. They could not look with any sort of hope to a termination of the struggle in America. Battles were fought, and blood was shed, but neither side had gained a victory which gave any hope of an approaching termination of the contest. From statements in the public press it appeared in the South the same spirit seemed to actuate both the white man and the slave; and he believed, that if the black population were to become combatants, they would range themselves on the side of their masters, rather than with that other portion of society who made war on women, issued proclamations at which the world might blush, and only treated the black slave with contumely and oppression. There being no hope of the termination of the war, of increased production of cotton, or of the continuance of the large contributions hitherto raised for the relief of the distress in Lancashire, what then should be done? The present winter, it should be remembered, had been peculiarly favourable to the poor, and the rigours of climate had not been added to the difficulty of obtaining food and clothing; consequently it would be great good luck if the distress in Lancashire should not be worse in the ensuing year than in the present. What, then, could be done to ameliorate the state of things in Lancashire? Would it be right to attempt mediation? There was a time when that might have been done. He believed, that if the Powers friendly to America had at the commencement of the struggle impressed on the belligerents the folly and ruin of an intestine conflict, the Americans might have listened to the words of common sense and friendship; but, now that blood had been drawn, that one portion of the States was fighting for independence and the other for conquest and extermination, and the horrors of war had been felt on both sides, he doubted whether the Americans would listen to any mediation however friendly or however well urged. Would, then, this country be prepared to recognise the South as an independent government, and to free its coast from a blockade which brought ruin on our operatives, and which he believed was of a questionable sort, as he understood it had always been laid down by high authority that an efficient blockade could only be maintained by vessels able to prevent all ingress and egress? Now, within a very few days, accounts had been received from Charleston to the effect that for a certain number of hours at least the Confederate ships had driven the blockading force away and freed the harbour. It was quite true that after a short interval the blockading force returned to its original position, where it still remained; but the fact that it had been compelled for a time to withdraw proved how very weak the blockade was. The length of the period during which the blockade had continued, and its ineffective character, combined with its temporary cessation, certainly afforded good grounds for inquiring whether the moment was not rapidly approaching when it ought to be treated as nought. From that source, however, there was no immediate prospect of a supply of cotton. The cotton manufacturers had been repeatedly blamed for not having used greater exertions to procure a supply of raw material. But, first of all, it was necessary to have full and accurate information as to the production of cotton in different parts of the world; and that information ought to be collected by means of a Royal Commission. The Glasgow Chamber of Commerce last autumn urged the Government to appoint a Commission; and subsequently, in presenting an address to Mr. Laing, they declared that they remained of opinion that the course suggested by them was reasonable and expedient, and that it was the duty, no less than the interest of the Government, to have issued a Commission of Inquiry. The noble Lord, in replying to the memorial, through his Secretary, Mr. Ashley, in September, 1862, expressed his regret that he could not comply with the request to appoint a Commission, as he held that the questions involved must be considered and determined by those interested; that it was undesirable the Government should interfere with the arrangements of merchants and manufacturers in the conduct of their mercantile transactions, and there was no more reason why the Government should interfere with arrangements in regard to cotton than that they should interfere with those affecting corn, timber, or any other article of commerce. As far as the principle of that answer went, it was sound and statesmanlike, but there were exceptions to every rule. The noble Lord would, no doubt, recollect that some years ago, when the agricultural interest was thrown into a state of great distress by certain alterations in the policy of the country, large loans were offered by way of relief to landed proprietors for the improvement of their estates. That measure had, he believed, been attended not only with immediate, but permanent benefit both to the agricultural interest and the country at large. He was disposed to hold that a loan might now be made, with equal justice and success, for the purpose of promoting the cultivation of cotton in some colony where there was a reasonable prospect that it could be produced of good quality and at a cheap rate. The information which was required in order to determine which colony was best adapted for that purpose, could be obtained more effectually by a Royal Commission than by a Committee of the House. Many men of great practical experience would be excluded from the latter who would be eligible for the former. Hence the Report of a Commission would carry with it greater weight. The first thing to do was to endeavour to obtain the best and the most reliable information as to where cotton could be grown; and if a loan should be required for the purpose of obtaining a supply of cotton, it would be wise and prudent, and common justice, that a loan should be granted by the Legislature. The importance of an accurate knowledge of the state of affairs in their distant possessions was proved by the mischance which had occurred at Sedashegur. The Manchester Cotton Company had despatched a vessel to that place, relying on the statement of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for India, that a pier and roads would be constructed by the time the vessel arrived. On the contrary, however, when the ship reached its destination, there was neither pier nor road to be seen. The company had therefore been misled by the incorrect information which the right hon. Baronet had given, of course unknowingly. The right hon. Gentleman had, however, recently stated at Halifax that it was owing to the prevalence of fever that the works were delayed. With regard to a supply of cotton from the colonies, Sir George Bowen, the Governor of Queensland, had repeated in one of his despatches that that part of Australia was admirably adapted both in soil and climate for the cultivation of the most valuable description of Sea Island cotton, and that the practicability of obtaining good crops there had been proved by several successful experiments. Mr. Bazley had expressed the highest opinion of a sample from Queensland, valuing it at 1s. 3d. a pound. He believed, that if it could once be proved that cotton could be grown either in Queensland, or in any other British colony, at a profit, little or no support would be required from the Government, for the public would be only too anxious to invest in any undertaking which promised a profitable return. There was another place where, as he was informed, cotton could be grown with great facility. He alluded to Jamaica. Indeed, he entertained little doubt that in many of the dependencies of Her Majesty, cotton could be successfully cultivated by free labourers. Some colonial cotton had already been tested, and he held in his hand a bit of cotton cloth manufactured from wool which gained the first prize at the International Exhibition, and which was approved by the authorities at Manchester. He would not delay the House by enlarging upon the credit and honour which would accrue to England if the foul blot could be removed from her of encouraging the slave trade by confining her purchases of cotton to South America. That question, however, was perhaps rather one for the philanthropists than for that House. For himself, he had no interest in the matter, except an earnest desire to mitigate the distress in Lancashire; and if he could persuade the House to take some steps in the direction he had indicated, thereby encouraging the production of free-grown cotton, he believed great benefits would result to the whole country. Whether the House would grant a Royal Commission, or whether it would prefer to submit the question to a Select Committee, he knew not; but his only object was that an inquiry should be speedily instituted, and that no effort should be spared to obtain that supply of cotton upon which depended the comfort and happiness—he might almost say the existence—of our Lancashire operatives. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving for the Address.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that a Royal Commission may be issued, to consider the best mode of obtaining a permanent supply of Cotton,"

—instead thereof.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: Sir, the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Lawrence Palk) has asked the House to present an Address to the Crown to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the best mode of obtaining a permanent supply of cotton wool. Before, Sir, I offer an opinion as to the course which it is desirable to take on this Motion, I wish to remark upon some of the observations that fell from the hon. Baronet at the commencement of his speech. I have no doubt that the hon.

Baronet has given us a correct narrative of the distressed condition of those parts of the country to which he has directed his inquiries. I can only say for myself, and I believe I may also speak for every Member of this House, that we join with him most entirely in the deep sympathy he has expressed for the distress which he has described to us. In the Speech from the Throne that feeling was expressed, and was responded to by the House. In fact, Sir, it would be impossible for any one in this House—for the Government, or for any portion of the intelligent population of this country, to feel otherwise than deep interest in the condition of so important an industry as the cotton industry, that has contributed so greatly to the wealth and prosperity of this country, that employs so large a number of our population, that causes so great an amount of capital to be distributed amongst the operative classes, and that gives us so large a portion of our export trade. It furnishes forty per cent of our export trade in ordinary times, and even in the present time it represents thirty-three per cent of the whole export trade to foreign countries. It is unnecessary to say more than that we entirely concur with the hon. Baronet in those feelings he expresses of deep interest in the future fortunes of the cotton industry. But, Sir, the remedy which the hon. Baronet proposes is one I think that is very questionable. I doubt whether we ever had a Royal Commission analogous to that proposed by the hon. Gentleman. The meaning of a Commission is, that there is a practical evil for which a remedy is asked, and that there are means at the command probably of the Government or of Parliament to obviate that evil. Now, I cannot understand that any Report which a Royal Commission could make would justify the Government in undertaking, or would in fact give Parliament reason to undertake, by direct encouragement, the cultivation of cotton, either by advancing money or commencing operations as cotton agriculturists or cotton traders. I do not know what acts of the Executive or what laws of Parliament would be likely to follow, consistently with free trade policy, which Parliament has adopted, if this Commission were granted. The facts that this Commission would lay before the House are already fully in the possession of the House; and, I believe, have been extensively circulated throughout the country.

Mr. Milner Gibson

Some time since the Cotton Supply Association, to which the hon. Baronet referred at the outset of his speech, was formed, and at the outset of its career put itself into communication with the Foreign Office. The Foreign Office complied with their request that the Foreign Secretary would instruct the British Consuls in various parts of the world to reply to any queries relating to the probability of growing cotton in different countries which that association should think necessary to be sent out. The Foreign Office accordingly sent circulars to Brazil, Egypt, Turkey, and other places, at the instance of the Cotton Supply Association, and I believe the Earl of Malmesbury went the length of recommending that the Treasury should give some pecuniary aid, which, I think I am correctly informed, was afforded by the Treasury for the purpose of defraying the expenses incurred by the Cotton Supply Association in growing cotton experimentally in different countries. From the outset, when the Earl of Clarendon was Foreign Secretary, until Earl Russell held the seals of office, every endeavour has been made to co-operate with the Cotton Supply Association, for the purpose of procuring from foreign countries any information that possibly could be acquired to afford facilities for getting a supply of cotton. I contend that a Commission could do nothing that has not already been done. There is no mystery, no contested point, into which a Commission could with any hope of advantage institute an inquiry. In fact, the hon. Baronet has not clearly explained whether the Royal Commission which he would have appointed is to take evidence here, or is itself to travel to all those various countries—to Africa, to Brazil, to India, and even to the Fijee Islands—and locally investigate the capabilities of these different countries for the growth of cotton. Such an inquiry as that would have a very lengthened duration, and would, I think, be a cause of great regret, in consequence of the delay that would arise, even to the hon. Baronet himself. Now, I know it may be said that it can do no harm to inquire—it can never do any harm to inquire—and that in the present condition of the manufacturing districts it would be ungracious not to accede to a proposal for mere inquiry, and that therefore the Government ought to agree to the appointment of the Royal Commission, because, if it can do no good, it can do no harm. Now, Sir, it seems to me that it would be unbecoming in the Government to agree to the appointment of a Royal Commission on such an understanding. There ought to be some definite benefit and practical good to be obtained, and one which there appears every probability of arriving at before a Commission is appointed. But is it really true, I will ask, that the appointment of a Commission would do no harm? I, for one, am not of that opinion. On the contrary, Sir, I am afraid that if a Commission were appointed, such a step might lead to the impression out of doors that the Government or Parliament was about to take upon itself, either by means of a bounty or otherwise, the promotion of the cultivation of cotton. If such a feeling were spread through the country, the effect would be that the enterprise which is now beginning to manifest itself would be paralysed, and that undertakings now about to commence would be suspended, until parties had had an opportunity of seeing what was to be the course of action taken by Government and the Parliament. Therefore, I think that itself is a reason why the Government should not listen to the argument that a Commission of Inquiry would be a harmless proceeding if it could do no good. The hon. Baronet has mentioned several places from which cotton might be procured, but from whence he seemed to infer that it was necessary that further information should be obtained. Amongst these he mentioned Queensland and Jamaica. Now, it happens that two companies which have been recently formed with considerable capital, and supported entirely by private enterprise, are companies for the purpose of growing cotton in Queensland and Jamaica, these being two of the places which he mentioned to which a Commission should be sent for the purpose of obtaining information. The formation of these various companies for the promotion of the cultivation of cotton is a proof that the attention of capitalists is being directed to this channel for the employment of capital. These companies would, no doubt, be seriously injured if it were understood that as a result of the investigation of a Commission, Parliament was to interfere and come into competition with private and unaided enterprises. Sir, there is abundance of capital and there is no lack of enterprise in England to undertake what is necessary to supply the wants of the country. Capital will find its way wherever there is a field for profitable enterprise, and I certainly shall maintain that it is not the province of Government or of Parliament to undertake the supply of any article. I am quite sure that if, during the time of the agitation of the Corn Law question in this country, any hon. Member had proposed that a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into the best means for obtaining a permanent supply of food, those Gentlemen who were advocating free trade as the best course for procuring that permanent supply would have offered the most determined opposition to any such proposal. I hope, therefore, that for the reasons I have given the hon. Baronet will not press this Motion to a division, and I think he may be contented with having raised a very useful discussion. I think the House will be of the opinion that no practical benefit could be derived from the appointment of a Royal Commission such as has been proposed. Upon the question of India, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is prepared to say whatever is necessary in defence of the particular proceeding that refers to the road leading from Sedashegur. I am not aware of the particulars of that affair, but, generally speaking, with regard to India and its capacity to produce cotton, there appears to be no lack of information. We have three valuable works relating to the three Presidencies, called the Cotton Handbooks, giving a most elaborate description, and containing the most particular information as to the various parts of the three Presidencies, the actual condition of the cultivation of the soil, and the possibility of extending the growth of cotton throughout these three Presidencies. There can be no want of information in regard to our power of growing cotton in India. It may be possible, indeed, that obstacles may be removed by the Government, and that changes may be effected which would prevent the growth of cotton being impeded. In fact, the Committee which was appointed some years ago, and of which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) was Chairman, reported that with the encouragement that was then being given by Government by the removal of all obstacles to successful cotton growing in India, there was every probability that eventually a considerable supply of cotton suited for the English market would

to become combatants, they would range themselves on the side of their masters, rather than with that other portion of society who made war on women, issued proclamations at which the world might blush, and only treated the black slave with contumely and oppression. There being no hope of the termination of the war, of increased production of cotton, or of the continuance of the large contributions hitherto raised for the relief of the distress in Lancashire, what then should be done? The present winter, it should be remembered, had been peculiarly favourable to the poor, and the rigours of climate had not been added to the difficulty of obtaining food and clothing; consequently it would be great good luck if the distress in Lancashire should not be worse in the ensuing year than in the present. What, then, could be done to ameliorate the state of things in Lancashire? Would it be right to attempt mediation? There was a time when that might have been done. He believed, that if the Powers friendly to America had at the commencement of the struggle impressed on the beligerents the folly and ruin of an intestine conflict, the Americans might have listened to the words of common sense and friendship; but, now that blood had been drawn, that one portion of the States was fighting for independence and the other for conquest and extermination, and the horrors of war had been felt on both sides, he doubted whether the Americans would listen to any mediation however friendly or however well urged. MR. MILNER GIBSON: Sir, the hon. On the contrary, Sir, I am afraid that if a Commission were appointed, such a step might lead to the impression out of doors that the Government or Parliament was about to take upon itself, either by means of a bounty or otherwise, the promotion of the cultivation of cotton. If such a feeling were spread through the country, the effect would be that the enterprise which is now beginning to manifest itself would be paralysed, and that undertakings now about to commence would be suspended, until parties had had an opportunity of seeing what was to be the course of action taken by Government and the Parliament. Therefore, I think that itself is a reason why the Government should not listen to the argument that a Commission of Inquiry would be a harmless proceeding if it could do no good. The hon. Baronet has mentioned several places from which cotton might be procured, but from whence he seemed to infer that it was necessary that further information should be obtained. Amongst these he mentioned Queensland and Jamaica. Now, it happens that two companies which have been recently formed with considerable capital, and supported entirely by private enterprise, are companies for the purpose of growing cotton in Queensland and Jamaica, these being two of the places which he mentioned to which a Commission should be sent for the purpose of obtaining information. The formation of these various companies for the promotion of the cultivation of cotton is a proof that the attention of capitalists is being directed to this channel for the employment of capital. These companies would, no doubt, be seriously injured if it were understood that as a result of the investigation of a Commission, Parliament was to interfere and come into competition with private and unaided enterprises. Sir, there is abundance of capital and there is no lack of enterprise in England to undertake what is necessary to supply the wants of the country. Capital will find its way wherever there is a field for profitable enterprise, and I certainly shall maintain that it is not the province of Government or of Parliament to undertake the supply of any article. I am quite sure that if, during the time of the agitation of the Corn Law question in this country, any hon. Member had proposed that a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into the best means for obtaining a permanent supply of food, those Gentlemen who were advocating free trade as the best course for procuring that permanent supply would have offered the most determined opposition to any such proposal. I hope, therefore, that for the reasons I have given the hon. Baronet will not press this Motion to a division, and I think he may be contented with having raised a very useful discussion. I think the House will be of the opinion that no practical benefit could be derived from the appointment of a Royal Commission such as has been proposed. Upon the question of India, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is prepared to say whatever is necessary in defence of the particular proceeding that refers to the road leading from Sedashegur. I am not aware of the particulars of that affair, but, generally speaking, with regard to India and its capacity to produce cotton, there appears to be no lack of information. We have three valuable works relating to the three Presidencies, called the Cotton Handbooks, giving a most elaborate description, and containing the most particular information as to the various parts of the three Presidencies, the actual condition of the cultivation of the soil, and the possibility of extending the growth of cotton throughout these three Presidencies. There can be no want of information in regard to our power of growing cotton in India. It may be possible, indeed, that obstacles may be removed by the Government, and that changes may be effected which would prevent the growth of cotton being impeded. In fact, the Committee which was appointed some years ago, and of which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) was Chairman, reported that with the encouragement that was then being given by Government by the removal of all obstacles to successful cotton growing in India, there was every probability that eventually a considerable supply of cotton suited for the English market would find its way to England from India. Sir, I am afraid that there is something more necessary than the mere supply of cotton, for I believe it is not only a question of quantity, but a question of price. It is my opinion, that unless the price of cotton is fixed at such a rate as to enable the manufacturer to sell the manufactured articles themselves at a rate so as to reach the poorer classes in the various countries to which they are sent, it is not likely that we shall continue to have that extensive trade in cotton manufactures that has hitherto existed. You may get abundance of any article if you choose to go to the price requisite for its production, but what is necessary for the support of this great industry is an abundant supply of cotton at a cheap rate. It is the cheapness of the raw material that has caused our cotton manufacture to acquire the great dimensions that it has possessed, and without which I fear it will never become so extensive again. Seeing that the great cotton manufacturing system has grown up directly by individual enterprise, by the unaided effort of enterprising men—seeing that it owes nothing to legislative protection—I very much doubt whether it is likely to be revived from its present unfortunate position by any legislative protection. It will be revived, I have not the slightest apprehension, by those same means that caused it to grow up to the great magnitude to which it has attained. By leaving to individual effort and the operation of the law of supply and demand the provision of the markets of this country with cotton, as with all other articles, we shall be pursuing the course which will be most advantageous for the interests of the country, and especially for the interests of that industry whose cause the hon. Baronet has undertaken to plead.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MAGUIRE :—Sir, the attention of Parliament has been already frequently engaged during this Session in the consideration of distress prevailing in the Lancashire district; but there is another portion of the Empire in which distress of a grievous nature exists, and which is justly entitled to the consideration of this House. Much soreness has been felt and expressed in Ireland, that while in

Speeches from the Throne allusion has been made, last year and this year, to the state of things in Lancashire, no notice whatever has been taken of the distress which last year was generally felt in many counties in Ireland, and is this year far more general and severe, in consequence of three successive bad harvests—in fact, three failures of the staple industry of that country. English Members, to understand the case of Ireland, must consider that there is no possible similarity in the circumstances of England and Ireland. While England, happily for herself, has many industrial resources, Ireland, may, as a rule, be said to have but one—that is, her agriculture—raising from the soil its various natural productions. With the exception of a few branches of manufacture, one of which is confined to a certain district, she has scarcely anything to depend upon save her agricultural industry; and if that fail, as it has for the last three years, the consequence must be severely felt by all classes of the community. During the last three years, unfortunately, Ireland, instead of advancing as other countries have done, has retrograded in material prosperity, in live stock, and in agricultural produce. This is proved beyond doubt by the Returns supplied by Government, and whose general accuracy has not been questioned. In the quantity of land under cultivation there has been a serious falling-off. The number of acres under cultivation in 1841 was 7,000,000, while in 1862 it was but 5,751,195, showing a decrease of nearly a million and a quarter acres. Comparing the year 1862 with the year 1861, the decrease in the number of acres under cultivation was 138,841. The decrease in the value of live stock in the same year, as compared with the year previous, was £1,564,710. Comparing the year 1862 with the year 1859, when the condition of the country was comparatively prosperous, the falling-off is somewhat fearful. In 1859, the value of live stock was £35,368,000, and in 1862 it was £31,204,000—showing a decrease of no less than £4,164,000. Another most important fact must be taken into consideration with respect to the downward progress of the country. Ireland, instead of being a grain-exporting country, has become a grain-importing country—instead of raising sufficient food for her people, and being able to send a large surplus to the markets of this country, she has come to depend for her own supply upon corn imported from abroad. Thus, in the year 1861 Ireland imported foreign corn to the amount of more than £6,000,000, while her exports were but £2,000,000 of her own produce. I have not the exact returns for last year; but assuming, which is not probable, that a less quantity was imported in 1862 than in 1861, and that I set it down for fear of exaggeration at but £4,000,000—it is clear that Ireland has, in two years, imported for her own use no less than £10,000,000 of foreign corn. Add to this the melancholy fact that she has lost in three years live stock to the amount of £4,164,000. If these facts do not show that Ireland is steadily going back, then, Sir, I do not know what value there is in figures. During the recess a distinguished Member of this House, writing under the signature "M.P." in one of the London morning papers (The Star), expressed his wonder how the people of Ireland paid for these enormous imports. The fact is, they were, as I have shown, paying for them out of their capital, instead of out of their income—in other words, they were eating up their substance. A few nights since, the annual Lord Mayor's banquet was given in Dublin. On that occasion, the Lord Mayor used these words—"The bad harvests of the last three years have produced great calamities in this country." The Lord Lieutenant has been, for a long time, accustomed to describe the state of the country in rather roseate hues, but during the last two years he has been obliged to dip his pencil in more sombre colours. In his speech on that occasion, his Excellency spoke as follows:—

"On some previous occasions it has been my good fortune in this place, and on these occasions, to dilate upon the favourable condition and satisfactory aspect of the country. On some previous occasions, I say, it has been my good fortune, without contradiction or objection to do so. Last year I was not enabled to take so sanguine a view, and this year I feel more strongly, in common with the Lord Mayor, who has already addressed some observations to you on the subject, that three moist and ungenial summers have left their traces upon the land and upon those who live by it. I concede that it is impossible to deny that considerable pressure now rests upon most of the agricultural classes. It has not, I am proud to think, made them indifferent to wide-spread distress in other quarters, and I trust that they will find such alleviation as may be requisite in local benevolence and in local exertions, whether in the form of increased attention to drainage or other methods of agricultural improvement. . . . The city of Dublin has naturally had its share in the pressure of the times which has been felt by the country at large."

Now, Sir, it is because I believe that "local benevolence and local exertions" cannot meet the necessity of the case, that I venture to submit this statement to the House; and I think I can show, by indisputable evidence, that the condition of Ireland is such as to demand not only the sympathy of Parliament and the country, but the active interposition of the Government. I shall read a few lines from a letter addressed by a wholesale firm in Dublin to the Mansion House Committee, on the 20th of January, enclosing a subscription. The letter is from Thomas Downy and Co., and contains this passage—

"We have had a long business acquaintance with all parts of Ireland, and the writer traversed the land in its length and breadth for many years by modes of conveyance which gave an opportunity to become acquainted with its state and condition, whilst of late we have regular reports from our agents and others. The reports this season, with the state of trade, satisfy us that excepting the famine years of 1847 and 1848, there is, and will be, more difficulty felt by the small farmer in paying his rent, tilling and cropping his ground, by the small shopkeeper in meeting his engagements, and by the labourer and artisan in supporting themselves and families, than there has been for many, many years."

That is the letter of a practical man, who is thoroughly acquainted with the state of the country. The Mansion House Committee issued an address, and depicted a gloomy state of things. Now, I may here remark that so impressed was he with the existence of the distress represented by the Committee, that Her Majesty's Attorney General for Ireland sent a letter of sympathy, in which he enclosed a cheque for £25. The Committee in their report say—

"Having thus shown that population and agricultural production were largely on the decrease last year, we turn in vain to any branch of industry, trade, or commerce which would indicate a result less discouraging. The savings banks, the loan fund, the pawn office, unerring tests of popular comfort or depression, the county courts—where ejectment and civil bills, for small sums, are tried—the bankrupt court, personal and real property, funded property, our banks, our railways, our few branches of manufacture, our trade, our commerce, the condition, singly as well as cumulatively, of every industrial and mercantile interest in the country, indicates a depression such as had not been reached in Ireland since the close of the famine period. One important element, however, has considerably increased, and that is taxation."

The last sentence contains a most important allusion—to the rapid increase in the taxation of Ireland; but, as my hon. and gallant Friend behind me (Colonel Dunne) intends to bring that subject specially forward, I shall not in any way allude to it now. Nor, indeed, shall I be induced to travel for one moment from the object which I now have alone in view—to prove the existence of severe and wide-spread distress in Ireland. I have received a short and pithy letter from a Protestant Gentleman, Captain Knox, Proprietor of The Irish Times, who takes a most creditable part in endeavouring to promote the relief of distress in the country. Writing on the 13th of February, he says—

“In the course of my business I am brought into contact with persons of almost every class and of every shade of politics, and I have no hesitation in saying that for years past there has not been so much stagnation in trade, and destitution in the country, as exists at present. While the spring work will, to some extent, though in a very small degree, relieve the labouring classes, it will do but little towards ameliorating the condition of the small landholders and small shopkeepers. The present state of this country demands the earnest attention of the Government; or, if they continue to pursue the policy which they have hitherto adopted on this question, then I trust that the Legislature will see the necessity for some action being taken. What is greatly to be feared is, that these periods of distress will not only completely impoverish the country, but that they will become chronic.

Having quoted a Protestant authority, I may now quote an eminent Catholic authority; and few, if any, know the condition of Dublin more accurately than the Most Rev. Dr. Cullen. I shall only read the following extract from a letter dated the 18th February:—

“I regret to state, in reply to your queries, that there is great and general distress in Dublin. The Sisters of Charity, who are constantly engaged in ministering to the wants of the poor; the gentlemen of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, who occupy themselves in the same work of benevolence, and the parochial clergy, who are called at every hour to visit the resorts of misery and sickness—all agree in stating that the destitution now prevailing, is almost equal in extent, and intensity, to that of the years of famine. Vast numbers of poor people, driven from their little holdings in the country, have come to seek for the means of existence in Dublin, and have thus increased the amount of misery, which was already very great. In the mean time there is little employment for the labouring classes; trade is bad, and the shopkeepers and merchants have suffered a great deal in their business on account of the general want of money in the country, occasioned by three bad harvests. In every part of the city you meet with thousands of poor people evidently suffering from the want of food, and almost naked.

Mr. Maguire

Indeed, there is more misery in Dublin, under the care of the British Government, than you could discover were you to examine all the poorest towns of Belgium, France, and Austria. The people of Rome would be horrified were they to see so many barefooted women and children as are met with every day in Dublin . . . The population is greatly reduced, the agricultural produce is considerably diminished; whilst the country is so far from becoming “the mother of flocks and herds,” as some political economists would wish her to be, to the destruction of human beings, that the value of live stock is now less by several millions than it was some years ago.”

I shall now glance rapidly at other portions of Ireland. As to Tipperary, the Most Rev. Dr. Leahy thus describes its condition in a sentence—

“The distress is much worse than last year, and cannot be questioned, is not questioned, by any but those who, for sinister purposes, deny open facts.”

As to Limerick, my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for that county (Colonel Dickson) has already described it to the House, while corroborating my statement on the first night of the Session; and my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the City of Limerick (Major Gavin) has, on more than one occasion, assured me that he has seen sights of misery and horror, within a few miles of the city, such as he had not witnessed for ten years previously. I might adduce the testimony of a distinguished Member of this House—the Member for Horsham (Mr. Seymour FitzGerald)—who informed me that he was in the constant receipt of intelligence from the counties of Limerick and Tipperary, which described the condition of those counties as most appalling. I have the authority of the hon. and gallant Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) for saying that nothing worse than the present state of things has been in his county since the famine; and my hon. Friend, the junior Member of the county (The O’Conor Don), who has just left to discharge his duties as High Sheriff, fully corroborates that statement. Again, a meeting was to have been held yesterday in Sligo, to take into consideration the distress of the county. The county of Galway and the city are also in a sad condition, but it is unnecessary to enter into details. In Kerry the distress is so goading and keen, that it occasioned some opposition to the movement for the relief of Lancashire. The state of things was bad in Kerry last year, but it promises to be much worse this year. Now, turn to the county of Cork, and first to its Western districts. I have several letters in reference to various districts, but I shall only quote from one, especially as it describes what is common to the entire. The Right Rev. Dr. O'Hea, the Catholic Bishop of Ross, thus writes on the 16th of February, from Skibbereen—

"The labourer and the tradesman have had no employment. Some of that class have taken refuge in the workhouse with their families, and have thus forfeited any claim to the wretched cabins in which they lived. Others hold on to their little dwellings, struggling hard against every sort of privation. It is not unusual with them to come to me after a fast of twenty-four hours, craving for one meal for themselves and their families. Every morning the Sisters of Mercy, at their convent, give a breakfast to some thirty children; and it is my conviction that many of those young creatures must rest satisfied with that one meal. Distress, pinching distress, prevails in this town, and is likely to prevail until next harvest There is another class here worse off than those to whom I have alluded; for they are indeed ashamed to beg, and to ask even for temporary relief. I mean the class of small farmers, and that class includes many in this part of the Carberies. It is a mystery to me how they have struggled on to the present. I cannot believe that they can hold on much longer. They will not be able to seed their little holdings; consequently, next harvest can bring them no relief. They have no credit to get from the merchant. They have already parted with the horse, the cow—often the very furniture of their houses has been sold. Every other available article has been lodged in the pawn-office. They are reduced to the last extremity, living on turnips, for these are the cheapest kind of food. To know the reality, it would be necessary to visit their houses, and see things with one's own eyes. . . . Should there be a cessation of hostilities between the Northern and Southern States of America, it is my conviction that half the population of Ireland would be across the Atlantic in a few months."

I now turn to the better-circumstanced districts of the County Cork, and quote the following important letter from the Right Rev. Dr. Keane, the Catholic Bishop of Cloyne, who is thoroughly conversant with the condition of the people of his diocese. Writing on the 18th of February, he says—

"I regret to be obliged to say that there is great and general distress. At the end of three successive bad harvests, the last the worst, it could not be otherwise. In dry limestone districts, the potato crop was good in quantity and in quality; but in wet and retentive soils, the produce, in every instance short, often failed to cover the expense of cultivation. The corn crop was, on the whole, perhaps the worst ever known. On the most favoured lands, the wheat, as a rule, was scarcely half, and in many instances less than half, of a fair average; while the barley and oats were either worse, or did not ripen at all. Towards the end of October, there were, in various places, fields of corn lugged and blackening, on which day after day heavy rain continued to fall. To the poorer farmers the extent of loss cannot be overrated. The result to them and to others is, that they have neither money nor credit; the shopkeepers are without business; and the tradesmen and labourers are not employed. It is not easy to explain how the working classes, dependent on occasional labour, have got over the last four months. On the countenances of the children attending school may be noticed, as during the famine of '47 and '48, unmistakable proofs of destitution and of hunger."

In his Lenten Pastoral, the Bishop has this most touching passage—

"We regret, beloved brethren, to be forced to say, that Lent, or no Lent, fasting will be this year the rule for the greater number of the working classes. In the midst, then, of the saddening statements made to us by those who thoroughly understand their position, we need not exhort them to the practice of fasting, which has already become a matter of stern, unavoidable necessity."

As to the city of Cork I shall only quote a line from the last report of the Vincent Society, who really constitute a most important institution through which the best form of out-door relief is administered. Their last year's expenditure was £1,754, or £500 over the average. The report says:—"Unfortunately, we are now entering on a year of still greater destitution." I think, Sir, I have now adduced sufficient evidence to show, that if the operatives of Lancashire deserve the sympathy of this House, the sufferings of the people of Ireland equally deserve their sympathy, as well as the respectful and earnest consideration of her Majesty's Government. After three bad harvests, and the last the worst of the three, what else could there be but a state of great destitution in the land? I solemnly believe, that if Ireland should unfortunately have another bad harvest, in succession to those which we now deplore, the people will be reduced to such a condition, that they will take the first opportunity to flee from its shores in masses. Now, some Gentlemen may think it better that the population should leave their native shores in that manner; but for my part I should view it as a great calamity—a great calamity for Ireland, and a great calamity also for the Empire. Sir Robert Kane proved, when Ireland had more than 8,000,000, and perhaps 9,000,000, of inhabitants, that the land, if properly cultivated and its resources duly developed, might support a much greater population than that. I think his calculations went nearly to twice that number. It is sad therefore to think that a much diminished population should have no other resource but in quitting their native land. I hold, Sir, that the people of Ireland are as fully entitled to the consideration and assistance of the Government and the country as the people of Lancashire, who, I need not say, have had my warmest sympathy. The suffering in Ireland arose from natural causes, not from the passions of man; and why, therefore, because Providence, for its own wise ends, has again grievously afflicted them, are they not as much entitled to sympathy as if their sufferings arose from the consequences of a war in a foreign country? The suffering of Ireland has arisen from no overtrading, but is due to causes quite as much beyond the control of those who have to endure it as the cotton crisis in Lancashire. It will be no answer to me to say that in some unions the rates are still apparently moderate. In many they are high; but were they apparently moderate in all, it would be really no answer to my statements. The hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), the other night, said, he should deplore any great increase of the poor rates in Lancashire, because it would drag down many of the ratepayers to the level of the paupers. The same remark would apply to Ireland. In districts where the rates appear comparatively low, they yet fall with crushing weight upon the small farmers, and even upon the shopkeepers, whose resources have been greatly reduced, and who, in fact, have scarcely the means left of supporting themselves. Nor has the distress by any means reached its height. It is a cruel policy to throw a people upon their unaided resources; when those resources are so fearfully diminished by three successive failures of their staple industry. There will be, to a certain extent, relief afforded to the labouring class by out-door employment during the next month or two; but from the month of May to the month of September, when the harvest will be got in, I am afraid the sufferings of the people will be fearful. The effect already has been terrible. Country towns, once the seats of happiness and prosperity, are literally collapsed, and trade is in those towns utterly annihilated; and if things progress in the same sad direction, the result will be that half the towns in Ireland will become in a short time heaps of ruins. Sir, if the Government are satisfied that the state of things in Ireland is such as has been described in the statements which I have quoted, they are bound in some way or other to come to its rescue. I may be asked, what are they to do? Well, it is I who ask the Government if they have in their contemplation any remedial measure—for I can assure the right hon. Baronet that his Registration Bill is not a measure of relief, and will do nothing to meet the difficulty of the times. The Drainage Bill of my hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Dickson) will, no doubt, effect much good; but even it, if now passed, could not afford immediate relief. I still could suggest that much could be done, were there the desire to do it. For instance, in many parts of the country, fishing, which is an important branch of industry with the large coast population, cannot be carried on in safety in consequence of the dangerous and unprotected nature of the coast; why should not small harbours be made or improved, and piers be made in such localities? Then there is another description of useful work, which would be of enormous advantage at this moment. I am told that in certain districts of Ireland distress does not prevail—why? Because a railway is being carried through, and it affords extensive employment. Now, in consequence of the prevalent depression, railway enterprise languishes in many districts, and the works are still unproceeded with. I could point out two in my own county, which would pass through poor districts—from Cork to Macroom, and from Bandon to Skibbereen—and which would be of great benefit to the districts through which they are to pass. Are there, then, no railway enterprises in Ireland which could be stimulated by being assisted? Surely, by lending money on easy terms, such undertakings could be materially promoted. Why should not the Government aid in giving life to these languishing enterprises—which are good for all classes and for all interests—good for the country, and good for the empire. Then, there are works which the Government may themselves undertake in various localities. But why enter into particulars? If the Government are convinced that distress exists in Ireland, and are in earnest in their sympathy, the means of affording relief could be found. In the other House, a few nights since, the Pope's Government was taunted with the defect of being a "paternal" government. Well, Sir, I confess I should prefer a little more of the paternal in the dealings of our Government with the people of Ireland in the hour of their necessity; and I sincerely trust that they will take the condition of that country into their best consideration in order to avert a calamity which is not only impending, but seems inevitable. I trust I have not too long occupied the attention of the House, and that I have strictly redeemed my promise by confining myself to the sole object for which I have risen on this occasion—which is, to draw the attention of Parliament and the country to the present state of things in Ireland, and to elicit from the Government some explanation on the subject. I now, Sir, beg to ask of the Irish Secretary the Question of which I have given notice—namely, Whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the distress now existing in Ireland; and, if so, whether it is in their contemplation to adopt any measures for its relief?

COLONEL DICKSON said, he wished to return his thanks to the hon. Gentleman for having brought forward this subject. It must be admitted on all hands that deep distress existed in Ireland, and he wished to impress on the right hon. Secretary for Ireland the necessity of taking some step to prevent its continuance. It was not only in the agricultural districts, but in the country towns that the distress was felt. The commercial interest also was suffering. The proprietors of large concerns, possessed of good capital, in considerable towns, had informed him that the season last winter had been such as almost to induce them to shut up their establishments. He entirely approved the suggestion which had been made of affording assistance to railways in course of construction. In connection with all such works there was a large amount of capital locked up, and the right hon. Baronet might well turn his attention and that of the Government to the desirability of unlocking some of that capital, and rendering it available for the construction of the works. Great stress had recently been laid on the amount of poor rate in some parts of England, and provision had been made that when in the distressed districts the poor rate rose to 3s. 6d. in the pound rates in aid should be collected in the adjoining district; but in many parts of Ireland the poor rate this season had considerably exceeded that amount. He had no wish to draw comparisons between the distress in Ireland and that in Lancashire. He was proud to think that his countrymen in Ireland had not been behindhand in their subscriptions for the relief of distress in Lancashire. They recollected the provision made for them in former years, and wished to return the kindness which had been shown to them. But, while attending a meeting in his own county to collect subscriptions for that purpose, he could not but feel some compunction in asking his countrymen to subscribe to relieve a population whose poor rates did not exceed 3s. 6d. in the pound, when there were parts of Ireland where the poor rates were 4s., 5s., and even 6s. in the pound. That was a serious state of affairs, and he hoped the Government would take it into anxious consideration. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had at length discovered that things were retrograding in that country. It was not in the power of private individuals to relieve or mitigate the distress that existed. That was to a great extent within the power of the Government; and he hoped the right hon. Baronet would insist on their allowing him to introduce some measure to prevent the population of Ireland from longer suffering such misery and distress.

SIR ROBERT PEELE: Sir, I have listened with great attention to the remarks by which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) prefaced his Question, and I am bound to admit, speaking on behalf of the Government, it is evident there never was any intention to deny that, consequent on three successive deficient harvests, naturally a state of things exists in Ireland which must not only cause considerable pressure on those to be relieved, but on the small farmers, and especially the shopkeepers. The hon. and gallant Officer (Colonel Dickson) has stated that my noble Friend his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant has at length admitted the distress, but surely he must acknowledge that no more benevolent and kind-hearted nobleman exists, or one who would be more disposed to come forward and give his assistance if it were thought expedient on the part of the Government. I do not quarrel with the right of the hon. Gentleman to bring this question before the House and Parliament. I am bound to say no one is more entitled than he is to bring it forward, when I recollect the position he took recently in the county of Cork to arouse a feeling of sympathy towards those who were suffering distress in Lancashire. The Dublin Relief Committee, of which I was an attentive member, could not refrain from expressing our admiration of the conduct of the hon. Gentleman as Mayor of Cork. The words which he used on that occasion entitle him to the warmest respect, for, placed in the position which he occupied, he was surrounded by considerable difficulties. With what might have been the excuse of considerable pressure and suffering in his own country, he came nobly forward and said—

"Let us recollect the sufferings we underwent in the famine years, and let us stretch forward a liberal hand for the relief of our suffering fellow countrymen. . . . There are in every manufacturing town of Lancashire thousands of the same blood and race as ourselves who this day appeal to our sympathy in their misery, to our compassion, to our humane and Christian feelings."

And he went on to say—

"We shall give this day to our countrymen what we can afford, and we all meet as Christian men, on a common platform, to do a common act of Christian kindness."

The result of the appeal was a magnificent subscription in Cork, and no man, therefore, is better entitled than the hon. Gentleman to come forward now and lay before Parliament and the country the condition of Ireland at this moment. I can only reply to the hon. Gentleman in the language used by the noble Viscount at the head of the Government. Over the causes that afflict Ireland we have no control; they are the result of inclement seasons, of atmospheric influences, that it would be impossible to circumscribe or prevent; while the distress in Lancashire springs from human causes, which, God knows, we all desire should come to a termination as speedily as possible. When the hon. Gentleman endeavours to frame a comparison between the suffering in Ireland and Lancashire, we must remember, that terrible as have been the trials in Lancashire, no public grants of money were made. The destitute have been supported partly by the rates, partly by the liberal generosity of persons in all quarters of the world; and therefore, if in England we have not come forward with any special grants, I think the hon. Member and other hon. Members will agree with me that it would be very difficult for the Government and for me, speaking as an humble and subordinate Member of that Government, to propose grants for the alleviation of distress in Ireland. I must call the attention of the hon. Member to a report issued by the Dublin Central Relief Committee, in which they state that—

"£8,000 have been received by this Committee; besides which, upwards of five times that sum have been allocated by local authorities engaged in the same humane duty."

MR. MAGUIRE :—That was last year.

SIR ROBERT PEEL :—The report was issued, I believe, in the month of September. I have also learned by the Australian newspapers that an amount exceeding £7,000 has been subscribed by the inhabitants of Australia towards the funds in the hands of the Dublin Committee. I do not for a moment deny that a period of very severe pressure does exist, and that it will require great care and vigilance to overcome it; but it is not an occasion on which Government ought to come forward with special loans or grants of money. I am justified in saying that there are only three unions in Ireland—Cork, Limerick, and the South Dublin Union—where there is any pressure on the accommodation which the work-houses afford. There has been a large increase of out-door relief lately, consequent on the more lenient action of the Poor Law passed last year, but I must say that the state of things in Ireland bears no comparison with the position of affairs in Lancashire or with the facts disclosed in the Earl of Derby's speech. The hon. Member for Rochdale stated that in that town alone, with a population of 38,000, there are 20,000 persons in the receipt of poor relief and assistance from other benevolent channels; while in Ireland, with a population of 5,700,000, the total number in receipt of indoor and outdoor relief is 75,000. I admit that the number, even at that limit, is unfortunately too great, and that the present moment, perhaps, does not afford a fair criterion; but, taking the comparison as presented by the Poor Law figures, I am disposed to believe that the state of Ireland does not justify the melancholy picture which some persons are disposed to draw. The hon. Member also referred to the statistics of Irish prosperity, and observed that the number of acres under cultivation had decreased, while the live stock had increased in number. That is perfectly true. Owing to successive bad seasons, the farmers have thought it better to turn their holdings into pasturage than to expose themselves to the losses entailed by bad and defective crops. It was contended by the hon. and gallant Member for Limerick that the rates in Ireland were very heavy—I think he said over 3s. 6d. in the pound, in a very great number of instances. It is important that I should put my hon. and gallant Friend right on that head, because I have just received a return from Dublin showing the average poundage on the rates now in course of collection in Ireland. It says—

“There are fifty-four electoral districts where the rates exceed 3s. in the pound, and there are eight where the rates exceed 5s.; but the average poundage on the rates in Ireland does not exceed more than 1s. 2d. in the pound.”

That does not show a very heavy pressure generally on the rates; and I would observe, that with all this suffering, I am informed by the best authority that the sanitary condition of the people was never better. A great deal of harm, in my opinion, is done by speeches and discussions in the public press as to “how Ireland may be saved.” They are calculated to exercise the worst possible effect on classes of persons whose condition is undoubtedly improving. [“No, no!”] Well, of course, that is a matter of opinion, and I hold my opinion very strongly. No doubt much distress does exist, but in every case where the slightest appearance of undue pressure has been reported to the Government I lost not a moment in taking every step to excite attention to the circumstances, and particularly to incite the Poor Law Inspectors to active measures. I do not wish to make the slightest allusion to my personal exertions; but as the hon. Gentleman refers to the precautions which the Government ought to take, I am compelled to do so. In one district in the County Cork great and sudden pressure existed, and a most charitable lady, whose name can never be mentioned except in connection with some noble action, wrote to ask whether I could give her any information with regard to that part of Ireland. The House will at once understand that I allude to Miss Coutts. I told her, that if she would communicate with a most respectable resident clergyman, Father Leader, I had no doubt he would give her every assistance. I believe she did so, and that the priest in the locality gave her the most satisfactory and complete information. That lady, out of her own pocket, paid the emigration expenses of numerous destitute families, and thus relieved the poverty of the district. That case, and others which I could mention in the County Galway, will show, that although I had no funds at my own disposal, no time was lost in taking every step which I was legitimately entitled to adopt for the purpose of attracting attention to cases of destitution. The subject is one well worthy the attention of the House and of Parliament, and I am glad the hon. Member has brought it forward. On the part of the Government, however, I can give him no answer but that which the noble Viscount has already done. I hope the depressing influences of past seasons may be ameliorated in the present year; and I believe we have passed the worst period of pressure. The Poor Law Commissioners write this day that they believe the climax will be reached in a fortnight or three weeks; and I am assured by other persons that, so far from the condition of Ireland deteriorating in the manner that some are disposed to believe, its state is sound and satisfactory; and that if the depressing influences of the time were past, the native energies of the people would rouse themselves, and we might look for an opening season of increased prosperity.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAY SCHEMES. OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the great number of Railway schemes affecting the Metropolis (upwards of thirty) introduced in the present Session, and to ask the President of the Board of Trade what protection is afforded to the public interests in this matter by the Department over which he presides; and also to move for Copies of any Reports made to the Metropolitan Board of Works by their engineer, or other officers, upon the Railway and other Private Bills affecting the Metropolis, introduced during the present Session. Parliament had intrusted to the Metropolitan Board of Works very extensive powers, and many hon. Members who had inspected the results must admit that the system of main drainage did infinite credit to the Board and its officers. But schemes of another kind might destroy what had already been done, and mar the good effects to be expected from the great works which had already been carried out, if steps were not taken to control them. The subject demanded the attention of the Government, and he was at a loss to conceive what useful steps could be taken unless

to become combatants, they would range themselves on the side of their masters, rather than with that other portion of society who made war on women, issued proclamations at which the world might blush, and only treated the black slave with contumely and oppression. There being no hope of the termination of the war, of increased production of cotton, or of the continuance of the large contributions hitherto raised for the relief of the distress in Lancashire, what then should be done? The present winter, it should be remembered, had been peculiarly favourable to the poor, and the rigours of climate had not been added to the difficulty of obtaining food and clothing; consequently it would be great good luck if the distress in Lancashire should not be worse in the ensuing year than in the present. What, then, could be done to ameliorate the state of things in Lancashire? Would it be right to attempt mediation? There was a time when that might have been done. He believed, that if the Powers friendly to America had at the commencement of the struggle impressed on the belligerents the folly and ruin of an intestine conflict, the Americans might have listened to the words of common sense and friendship; but, now that blood had been drawn, that one portion of the States was fighting for independence and the other for conquest and extermination, and the horrors of war had been felt on both sides, he doubted whether the Americans would listen to any mediation however friendly or however well urged. Would, then, this country be prepared to recognise the South as an independent government, and to free its coast from a blockade which brought ruin on our operatives, and which he believed was of a questionable sort, as he understood it had always been laid down by high authority that an efficient blockade could only be maintained by vessels able to prevent all ingress and egress? Now, within a very few days, accounts had been received from Charleston to the effect that for a certain number of hours at least the Confederate ships had driven the blockading force away and freed the harbour. It was quite true that after a short interval the blockading force returned to its original position, where it still remained; but the fact that it had been compelled for a time to withdraw proved how very weak the blockade was. The length of the period during which the blockade had continued, and its ineffective character, combined with its temporary cessation, certainly afforded good grounds for inquiring whether the moment was not rapidly approaching when it ought to be treated as nought. From that source, however, there was no immediate prospect of a supply of cotton. The cotton manufacturers had been repeatedly blamed for not having used greater exertions to procure a supply of raw material. But, first of all, it was necessary to have full and accurate information as to the production of cotton in different parts of the world; and that information ought to be collected by means of a Royal Commission. The Glasgow Chamber of Commerce last autumn urged the Government to appoint a Commission; and subsequently, in presenting an address to Mr. Laing, they declared that they remained of opinion that the course suggested by them was reasonable and expedient, and that it was the duty, no less than the interest of the Government, to have issued a Commission of Inquiry. The noble Lord, in replying to the memorial, through his Secretary, Mr. Ashley, in September, 1862, expressed his regret that he could not comply with the request to appoint a Commission, as he held that the questions involved must be considered and determined by those interested; that it was undesirable the Government should interfere with the arrangements of merchants and manufacturers in the conduct of their mercantile transactions, and there was no more reason why the Government should interfere with arrangements in regard to cotton than that they should interfere with those affecting corn, timber, or any other article of commerce. As far as the principle of that answer went, it was sound and statesmanlike, but there were exceptions to every rule. The noble Lord would, no doubt, recollect that some years ago, when the agricultural interest was thrown into a state of great distress by certain alterations in the policy of the country, large loans were offered by way of relief to landed proprietors for the improvement of their estates. That measure had, he believed, been attended not only with immediate, but permanent benefit both to the agricultural interest and the country at large. He was disposed to hold that a loan might now be made, with equal justice and success, for the purpose of promoting the cultivation of cotton in some colony where there was a reasonable prospect that it could be produced of good quality and at a

cheap rate. The information which was required in order to determine which colony was best adapted for that purpose, could be obtained more effectually by a Royal Commission than by a Committee of the House. Many men of great practical experience would be excluded from the latter who would be eligible for the former. Hence the Report of a Commission would carry with it greater weight. The first thing to do was to endeavour to obtain the best and the most reliable information as to where cotton could be grown; and if a loan should be required for the purpose of obtaining a supply of cotton, it would be wise and prudent, and common justice, that a loan should be granted by the Legislature. The importance of an accurate knowledge of the state of affairs in their distant possessions was proved by the mischance which had occurred at Sedashegur. The Manchester Cotton Company had despatched a vessel to that place, relying on the statement of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for India, that a pier and roads would be constructed by the time the vessel arrived. On the contrary, however, when the ship reached its destination, there was neither pier nor road to be seen. The company had therefore been misled by the incorrect information which the right hon. Baronet had given, of course unknowingly. The right hon. Gentleman had, however, recently stated at Halifax that it was owing to the prevalence of fever that the works were delayed. With regard to a supply of cotton from the colonies, Sir George Bowen, the Governor of Queensland, had repeated in one of his despatches that that part of Australia was admirably adapted both in soil and climate for the cultivation of the most valuable description of Sea Island cotton, and that the practicability of obtaining good crops there had been proved by several successful experiments. Mr. Bazley had expressed the highest opinion of a sample from Queensland, valuing it at 1s. 3d. a pound. He believed, that if it could once be proved that cotton could be grown either in Queensland, or in any other British colony, at a profit, little or no support would be required from the Government, for the public would be only too anxious to invest in any undertaking which promised a profitable return. There was another place where, as he was informed, cotton could be grown with great facility. He alluded to Jamaica. Indeed, he entertained little doubt that in many of the dependencies of Her Majesty, cotton could be successfully cultivated by free labourers. Some colonial cotton had already been tested, and he held in his hand a bit of cotton cloth manufactured from wool which gained the first prize at the International Exhibition, and which was approved by the authorities at Manchester. He would not delay the House by enlarging upon the credit and honour which would accrue to England if the foul blot could be removed from her of encouraging the slave trade by confining her purchases of cotton to South America. That question, however, was perhaps rather one for the philanthropists than for that House. For himself, he had no interest in the matter, except an earnest desire to mitigate the distress in Lancashire; and if he could persuade the House to take some steps in the direction he had indicated, thereby encouraging the production of free-grown cotton, he believed great benefits would result to the whole country. Whether the House would grant a Royal Commission, or whether it would prefer to submit the question to a Select Committee, he knew not; but his only object was that an inquiry should be speedily instituted, and that no effort should be spared to obtain that supply of cotton upon which depended the comfort and happiness—he might almost say the existence—of our Lancashire operatives. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving for the Address.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that a Royal Commission may be issued, to consider the best mode of obtaining a permanent supply of Cotton,"

—instead thereof.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: Sir, the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Lawrence Palk) has asked the House to present an Address to the Crown to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the best mode of obtaining a permanent supply of cotton wool. Before, Sir, I offer an opinion as to the course which it is desirable to take on this Motion, I wish to remark upon some of the observations that fell from the hon. Baronet at the commencement of his speech. I have no doubt that the hon.

Baronet has given us a correct narrative of the distressed condition of those parts of the country to which he has directed his inquiries. I can only say for myself, and I believe I may also speak for every Member of this House, that we join with him most entirely in the deep sympathy he has expressed for the distress which he has described to us. In the Speech from the Throne that feeling was expressed, and was responded to by the House. In fact, Sir, it would be impossible for any one in this House—for the Government, or for any portion of the intelligent population of this country, to feel otherwise than deep interest in the condition of so important an industry as the cotton industry, that has contributed so greatly to the wealth and prosperity of this country, that employs so large a number of our population, that causes so great an amount of capital to be distributed amongst the operative classes, and that gives us so large a portion of our export trade. It furnishes forty per cent of our export trade in ordinary times, and even in the present time it represents thirty-three per cent of the whole export trade to foreign countries. It is unnecessary to say more than that we entirely concur with the hon. Baronet in those feelings he expresses of deep interest in the future fortunes of the cotton industry. But, Sir, the remedy which the hon. Baronet proposes is one I think that is very questionable. I doubt whether we ever had a Royal Commission analogous to that proposed by the hon. Gentleman. The meaning of a Commission is, that there is a practical evil for which a remedy is asked, and that there are means at the command probably of the Government or of Parliament to obviate that evil. Now, I cannot understand that any Report which a Royal Commission could make would justify the Government in undertaking, or would in fact give Parliament reason to undertake, by direct encouragement, the cultivation of cotton, either by advancing money or commencing operations as cotton agriculturists or cotton traders. I do not know what acts of the Executive or what laws of Parliament would be likely to follow, consistently with free trade policy, which Parliament has adopted, if this Commission were granted. The facts that this Commission would lay before the House are already fully in the possession of the House; and, I believe, have been extensively circulated throughout the country.

Mr. Milner Gibson

Some time since the Cotton Supply Association, to which the hon. Baronet referred at the outset of his speech, was formed, and at the outset of its career put itself into communication with the Foreign Office. The Foreign Office complied with their request that the Foreign Secretary would instruct the British Consuls in various parts of the world to reply to any queries relating to the probability of growing cotton in different countries which that association should think necessary to be sent out. The Foreign Office accordingly sent circulars to Brazil, Egypt, Turkey, and other places, at the instance of the Cotton Supply Association, and I believe the Earl of Malmesbury went the length of recommending that the Treasury should give some pecuniary aid, which, I think I am correctly informed, was afforded by the Treasury for the purpose of defraying the expenses incurred by the Cotton Supply Association in growing cotton experimentally in different countries. From the outset, when the Earl of Clarendon was Foreign Secretary, until Earl Russell held the seals of office, every endeavour has been made to co-operate with the Cotton Supply Association, for the purpose of procuring from foreign countries any information that possibly could be acquired to afford facilities for getting a supply of cotton. I contend that a Commission could do nothing that has not already been done. There is no mystery, no contested point, into which a Commission could with any hope of advantage institute an inquiry. In fact, the hon. Baronet has not clearly explained whether the Royal Commission which he would have appointed is to take evidence here, or is itself to travel to all those various countries—to Africa, to Brazil, to India, and even to the Fejee Islands—and locally investigate the capabilities of these different countries for the growth of cotton. Such an inquiry as that would have a very lengthened duration, and would, I think, be a cause of great regret, in consequence of the delay that would arise, even to the hon. Baronet himself. Now, I know it may be said that it can do no harm to inquire—it can never do any harm to inquire—and that in the present condition of the manufacturing districts it would be ungracious not to accede to a proposal for mere inquiry, and that therefore the Government ought to agree to the appointment of the Royal Commission, because, if it can do no good, it can do no harm. Now, Sir, it seems to me that it would be unbecoming in the Government to agree to the appointment of a Royal Commission on such an understanding. There ought to be some definite benefit and practical good to be obtained, and one which there appears every probability of arriving at before a Commission is appointed. But is it really true, I will ask, that the appointment of a Commission would do no harm? I, for one, am not of that opinion. On the contrary, Sir, I am afraid that if a Commission were appointed, such a step might lead to the impression out of doors that the Government or Parliament was about to take upon itself, either by means of a bounty or otherwise, the promotion of the cultivation of cotton. If such a feeling were spread through the country, the effect would be that the enterprise which is now beginning to manifest itself would be paralysed, and that undertakings now about to commence would be suspended, until parties had had an opportunity of seeing what was to be the course of action taken by Government and the Parliament. Therefore, I think that itself is a reason why the Government should not listen to the argument that a Commission of Inquiry would be a harmless proceeding if it could do no good. The hon. Baronet has mentioned several places from which cotton might be procured, but from whence he seemed to infer that it was necessary that further information should be obtained. Amongst these he mentioned Queensland and Jamaica. Now, it happens that two companies which have been recently formed with considerable capital, and supported entirely by private enterprise, are companies for the purpose of growing cotton in Queensland and Jamaica, these being two of the places which he mentioned to which a Commission should be sent for the purpose of obtaining information. The formation of these various companies for the promotion of the cultivation of cotton is a proof that the attention of capitalists is being directed to this channel for the employment of capital. These companies would, no doubt, be seriously injured if it were understood that as a result of the investigation of a Commission, Parliament was to interfere and come into competition with private and unaided enterprises. Sir, there is abundance of capital and there is no lack of enterprise in England to undertake what is necessary to supply the wants of the country. Capital will find its way wherever there is a field for profitable enterprise, and I certainly shall maintain that it is not the province of Government or of Parliament to undertake the supply of any article. I am quite sure that if, during the time of the agitation of the Corn Law question in this country, any hon. Member had proposed that a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into the best means for obtaining a permanent supply of food, those Gentlemen who were advocating free trade as the best course for procuring that permanent supply would have offered the most determined opposition to any such proposal. I hope, therefore, that for the reasons I have given the hon. Baronet will not press this Motion to a division, and I think he may be contented with having raised a very useful discussion. I think the House will be of the opinion that no practical benefit could be derived from the appointment of a Royal Commission such as has been proposed. Upon the question of India, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is prepared to say whatever is necessary in defence of the particular proceeding that refers to the road leading from Sedashegur. I am not aware of the particulars of that affair, but, generally speaking, with regard to India and its capacity to produce cotton, there appears to be no lack of information. We have three valuable works relating to the three Presidencies, called the Cotton Handbooks, giving a most elaborate description, and containing the most particular information as to the various parts of the three Presidencies, the actual condition of the cultivation of the soil, and the possibility of extending the growth of cotton throughout these three Presidencies. There can be no want of information in regard to our power of growing cotton in India. It may be possible, indeed, that obstacles may be removed by the Government, and that changes may be effected which would prevent the growth of cotton being impeded. In fact, the Committee which was appointed some years ago, and of which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) was Chairman, reported that with the encouragement that was then being given by Government by the removal of all obstacles to successful cotton growing in India, there was every probability that eventually a considerable supply of cotton suited for the English market would valuation of Ireland; for, after a careful inquiry, he had ascertained that the charge would be only 5-16ths of a penny. With regard to the alleged pressure of local taxation in Ireland, he found also that the average of the taxation amounted to a fraction more than 2s. in the pound, or 10 per cent; whereas England was taxed to the extent of 20, and Scotland 10 per cent. The burden in Ireland, therefore, was not so very extravagant as the Committee had been led to suppose. Calculations had been made that the probable number of births and deaths in the course of the year upon a population of 5,764,000 would be 193,514 births and 132,756 deaths. That was upon an average of years, and might be considered as very nearly an accurate estimate. But as by Returns just presented the number of persons who had emigrated from Ireland during the last ten years exceeded 1,200,000, and emigration still continued, the future number of births and deaths might be less than he had mentioned. Upon that calculation, however, if the registrars, as he proposed, were paid 1s. for every entry, and the superintendent registrars 2d. out of the Consolidated Fund, the charge under the Bill would not exceed £16,300 per annum. The Government could not possibly allow that amount to be taken from the Consolidated Fund, and he hoped, therefore, the hon Member would not ruin the Bill by persisting in the Motion, and would not make a stand about 5-16ths of a penny. It was not a measure, as had been said, for merely social science purposes, but, on the contrary, was one of great national importance.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought that the Bill, inasmuch as it made no provision for the registration of marriages, would be practically valueless. He could not regard it, therefore, as anything more than a Bill for raising £16,000 from the distressed classes of Ireland. He did not see why such statistical pedantry should not be paid for out of the Imperial exchequer.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, the great complaint in Ireland was the rapid and enormous increase of the county rates. His objection to the Bill was that it proposed to put an additional burden of £500 a year upon each county. He was, however, quite ready to agree to the proposition of the right hon. Baronet as to charging the expenses of registration of births and deaths on the poor rates in Ireland, if he would, on the other hand, agree to allow one half the charges for workhouse, school-masters, and medical officers to be paid by Parliament in ease of the rate, as was the case in England. Last year the sums asked for these purposes amounted to no less than £130,000. £16,000 a year was a small sum, certainly, for the working of a useful Act; but he would ask, looking at the fact that the Poor Law Act was of recent introduction in Ireland, whether it was wise to divert any portion of the funds raised for the relief of the poor to a purpose foreign to the object of the Poor Relief Act?

MR. BAGWELL said, he should support the Bill, which, he was glad to find, followed the English Act. He always liked to see the two countries placed on the same footing as far as legislation was concerned. The expenses of the working of the Registration Bill were trifling, and would never be felt. He hoped to see the day when Irish Members would cease to plead in forma pauperis in that House. No doubt distress existed in Ireland, but it ought to be met there, and not paraded before the country as it had been.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would be glad to see the Bill passed, because he thought it was a good measure, but the Amendment might be adopted with advantage. The Bill, as it stood, did not follow the English practice. In England £37,200 was voted by Parliament for the superintendent registrars and registrars. By the present Bill it was proposed to impose £16,000 upon the counties of Ireland for the payment of the same classes of officers.

SIR ROBERT PEEL explained that the superintendent registrars were to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, and the registrars out of the poor rates.

MR. HENNESSY said, that was not the English system. In England both the superintendent registrars and the registrars were paid out of funds voted by Parliament.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he thought there never was a juster claim made upon the House. It was very well for a wealthy gentleman to recommend Irish Members to keep their distresses to themselves; but he forgot they had been patiently listening for several nights to the detail of English distress in Lancashire. They had heard of fifty-four unions in Ireland where the rates were 3s. in the pound, and nine in which the rates were 5s., without any rate in aid. He thought, therefore, the House should listen to the appeals of Irish Members on behalf of their distressed constituents. Did anybody suppose that £16,000 a year would represent all the expense entailed by this Bill? By Sections 21 and 22 the guardians of unions were to provide depôts for the safe keeping of registers, according to a plan approved by the Registrar General, and who could tell what the expense of those offices would be, and the cost of keeping them up?

Mr. HASSARD said, he wished to know what benefits the Bill would confer. The right hon. Baronet had spoken of its value in the succession to property, but there was nothing in the Bill to make certificates of registration evidence.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Bagwell) had read the Irish Members a lecture. Would the hon. Member carry out his own theory of equal laws for England and Ireland, for instance, in the case of education? Would he assist other Irish Members to obtain back their own Legislature in Ireland, when they could effectually confine their distresses and grievances to their own country? There was such distress in Ireland that any addition of taxation would be felt as a heavy grievance. There was no desire to imperil the Bill, but he did hope the Amendment would be adopted.

Mr. BAGWELL said, he never had been favourable to the repeal of the Union, and never should be.

Mr. CARDWELL said, he did not rise to discuss the questions of national education or of repeal of the Union, or of the distress in Lancashire, except so far as to remark, that whatever the distress in Lancashire might be, no demand for aid from the Consolidated Fund had been made. He was very desirous that a Registration Bill should be passed. The hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessey) was quite under a mistake. They were really debating whether they should charge on the poor rate in Ireland that which was charged on the local rates in England, and on the Consolidated Fund for Ireland that which was borne by the same fund for England. That was what the Bill intended; and if that object was not clearly carried out as the provisions stood, he undertook that they should be amended. He put it, therefore, to the Irish Members whether it was worth while to frustrate the measure, the advantages of which they were anxious to secure to their country, by insisting on a proposal to which the English and Scotch Members would never consent.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he was ready to accept the Bill if the Government would ensure to the ratepayers of Ireland the same powers as ratepayers in England possessed with reference to registration of births and deaths. At the same time, he wished to take that occasion to deprecate eulogies of emigration from Ireland. To his mind an emigration was almost as sad an event for that country as a death. He hoped that the population of Ireland would increase, and that the means of supporting that population would increase also.

Mr. MONSELL said, he concurred with the hon. and gallant Member for the Queen's County (Colonel Dunne), in thinking that the local authorities in Ireland should be placed on a footing with the local authorities in England and Scotland with reference to the question. If the ratepayers of Ireland must pay the expenses of enforcing this measure, why should they not have the power of appointing the registrars?

CAPTAIN DAWSON said, he could not see why the collection of what were called vital statistics should not be paid out of the Imperial exchequer as well as agricultural statistics and the decennial census returns; but, at the same time, he should be sorry to endanger the passing of the necessary measure.

Mr. VANCE said, the Bill violated the very principle claimed for it by the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Bagwell)—that Ireland ought to have the benefit of equal laws with the rest of the kingdom.

Mr. HENNESSY said, he would accept the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy. The question was, out of what fund were the registrars in Ireland to be paid? The sum of £37,200 was voted in last year's Estimates for the fees and expenses of the superintendent registrars and registrars of births, deaths, and marriages in England. He wished, therefore, to know whether the Government were prepared to propose in their next Estimates that a proportionate sum should be voted for the registrars in Ireland. [Sir ROBERT PEEL: No.] Under these circumstances he should feel bound to support the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

Mr. BUTT said, he would support the clause in its then shape, as it was an exact copy of the English Act.

LORD NAAS said, he thought there was great force in the argument from the analogy of the English Act; but why should not that analogy be carried out by giving those who paid the registrars the power of appointing them? If that proposal was acceded to by the right hon. Baronet, it might be well to limit the maximum payment, and then leave the boards of guardians to get the work done for less if they could.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he trusted the Secretary for Ireland would consent to the measure being assimilated in every respect to the English and Scotch Bills.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, that he thought they were entitled to receive an assurance, that if the English registrars received anything from the Government, the Irish registrars should receive a like sum.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he had thought it best to adopt the principle of appointing medical officers as the registrars; but he had no objection to modify the clause to this extent—that the guardians should appoint the registrars, preference being given to medical officers.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would put it to the right hon. Baronet to give a more distinct answer to the question as to what became of the £16,300 voted in the Estimates for superintendent registrars and registrars of births, marriages, and deaths.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he believed the sum had reference to the expenses incurred by the superintendent registrars.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he willingly assented to the principle of analogy between that and the English Act, but insisted that it should be carried out. If it was found, on inquiry, that any part of the £16,400 went to the English registrars, would they have a similar credit for Ireland?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the terms of the Bill, financially, were intended by the Government to be identical with those of the English Act.

MR. M'MAHON said, the English Act was for registering births, deaths, and marriages. Give them a register of marriages, and they would not object. The present measure was of no profit or use to the people of Ireland. It would be of use for the decennial census for Imperial purposes, just as a return of emigration, and so on, but it was of no value to the people. Give them marriages, a record of which would be of service as touching kinship, heirship, and title to property, and they would not object to pay their proportion. He would press his Amendment to a division.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 38; Noes 23: Majority 15.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 9 to 17, inclusive.

Clause 18 (Registrars' Districts).

LORD NAAS said, that power was given in the English Act to enable boards of guardians to divide the unions into registration districts in the manner they thought most convenient for registering purposes. Great inconvenience would arise from the clause in its present shape, and he therefore proposed to leave out from the beginning to the word "Act" in line 19, and insert the words—

"The guardians of every union shall, on or before the 1st of January, 1864, divide the union into such and so many districts as they, subject to the approval of the Registrar General, shall see fit."

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 17, to leave out the words "Each dispensary district."

MR. LONGFIELD said, he should support the Amendment, on the ground that as the guardians had to pay and levy the rates to meet the expenses, they were the proper parties for dividing the unions into districts.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the Government thought it better to adopt the dispensary districts, which were well known to the people, than to give powers to boards of guardians to divide unions as they thought proper. By the former plan they obtained a uniformity, which would not be the case if the matter were left to the arbitrary decision of each board of guardians.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that as the dispensary districts existed in Ireland, and not in England, the Government felt that the existing arrangement ought to be made use of rather than a new one.

COLONEL VANDELEUR said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the dispensary districts were well defined, and ought to be adopted. If the election of the officers were left to the guardians, there would be canvassing from one end of the county to the other, and it would lead to a great deal of confusion.

MR. MONSELL said, Sir Richard Graham's experience showed that medical officers were not the best registrars. On the simple ground that the English and Scotch ratepayers had the power of appointing the registrars, he insisted that their appointment in Ireland should be vested in the local authorities.

SIR GEORGE GREY reminded the Committee that the noble Lord's Amendment did not touch the question of appointment.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 14: Majority 30.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 19 to 22, inclusive.

Clause 23 (Appointment of Registrars).

LORD NAAS said, he should move to leave out from the beginning to "district," in line 35, and to insert the following:—

"The guardians of every union shall appoint a person with such qualifications as the Registrar General may, by any general rule declare to be necessary, to be Registrar of Births and Deaths in each district and in every case of vacancy in the office of Registrar shall forthwith fill up the vacancy."

MR. HENNESSY said, he should support the clause as it stood, as he regarded the claims of the doctors to be paramount.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he must oppose the Amendment. Medical officers had been selected, not only because they were fittest, but because he believed that the appointment, as a general rule, would give most satisfaction to the people of Ireland.

COLONEL DICKSON supported the Amendment.

MR. MONSELL said, as the registrars in Scotland were not medical men, he did not see why they should be of that profession in Ireland.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he followed the opinion of Major Graham, who considered that the registrars should be medical men.

LORD NAAS said, Major Graham expressed himself in favour of medical men as against the constabulary, but he said nothing against other persons being employed.

MR. M'MAHON supported the Amendment.

COLONEL VANDELEUR opposed it, believing that if it were agreed to, very unfit persons would sometimes be elected.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 24 to 27 agreed to.

Clause 28 (Superintendent Registrars and Registrars to reside in their Districts).

MR. HASSARD proposed an Amendment directing the Registrar to appoint the days and hours during which he would attend at his residence or place of business for registration of births and deaths.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BAGWELL proposed in line 30 to insert after "business," "Provided always that dispensary houses in the Registrar's districts may, with consent of the dispensary committee, be used as registering offices."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to; as was also Clause 29.

Clause 30 (Registrar to learn and register Births and Deaths).

MR. M'MAHON said, he thought the period for giving notice to the Registrar was not long enough.

SIR ROBERT PEEL observed, that whereas in England the period allowed for actual registration was forty-two days, Ireland it was to be three months.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday, 2nd March.

LONDON COAL AND WINE DUTIES BILL.

London Coal and Wine Duties, — Acts considered in Committee:—

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill for further continuing and appropriating the London Coal and Wine Duties.

Resolution reported.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. MANNING, Mr. COWPER, and Mr. PEEL.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 27.]

EDUCATION OF FACTORY CHILDREN BILL.

Bill to make further provisions for the Education of Children employed in Factories and other Works, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BAXTER and Mr. BUCHANAN.

ORDNANCE—SELECT COMMITTEE.

Ordnance.—Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the expenditure incurred since the beginning of 1858 on various natures of improved Ordnance, whether obtained by contract or manufactured in the Public Departments, and into the results obtained by such expenditure."

And on February 26th Committee nominated, as follow:—Mr. MONSELL, Sir GEORGE LEWIS, General PERL, Captain JERVIS, Mr. BARING, Sir FREDERIC SMITH, Mr. DODSON, Sir JOHN HAY, Lord ROBERT CECIL, Mr. LAIRD, Major O'REILLY, Mr. BENECOFF, Mr. MORTON Peto, and Mr. VIVIAN.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock, till Monday next.

Monday, February 23, 1863.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS.—First Reading.—Gardens in Towns Protection [H.L.] (No. 14); Naval Coast Volunteers Act Amendment [H.L.] (No. 19); Illegitimate Children (Ireland) (No. 17); Drainage of Land (Ireland) (No. 18).

GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY (NEW METROPOLITAN STATION & BRANCHES) BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for the Second Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2°.

THE EARL OF DERBY, having presented Petitions against the Bill of Owners, Lessees, and Occupiers of Property in Finsbury Circus, and particularly one from Mr. Jackson, on behalf of a very important body of gentlemen, the subscribers to the London Institution for the Advancement of Literature and Useful Knowledge, proceeded to say that the facts of the case were nearly the same as stated in all the Petitions; but he wished to draw attention more particularly to that which had been instructed to him by the Institution which he had just mentioned. For the information of those among their Lordships who were not conversant with its site, he might observe that Finsbury Circus was situated in the heart of the City, adjoining a very poor and densely populated part of the town. The houses in the Circus and Square were occupied chiefly by medical men, clergymen, gentlemen holding appointments in the Bank of England; in short, by members of the higher middle class, whose occupations rendered it necessary that they should live in London, and who chose the site as one of the quietest they could procure. On one side of the square was the London Institution for the Advancement of Literature and Useful Knowledge, which was a very handsome building, and which had been erected at considerable cost. The Institution contained a valuable library, in the selection of which great care and judgment had been exercised. He had heard it stated that the library was second only to the library of the British Museum, and was particularly rich in works on International Law, to which reference was constantly being made; and it would be impossible for the subscribers to find a site in the neighbourhood for the re-constructing of the building. Finsbury Circus was the great resort of the poorer classes on fine days. It was extremely well laid out, and was the only place where, within a moderate distance, the people could obtain healthy exercise and a free circulation of air. There was, in addition, this peculiarity about it:—It was stated by Mr. Jackson in his Petition that an Act passed in the 52d year of the reign of George III. which, while empowering the Mayor and Commonalty of the City of London to grant building leases in Moorfields, provided that certain parts should be left open for the free circulation of air, and that for more than fifty years the owners and occupiers of property in the neighbourhood had enjoyed the use of the Circus thus reserved to them under the provisions of an Act of Parliament which the proposed Bill of the railway company would in effect repeal. Upon a former occasion, when the extension of railways through the most populous parts of the metropolis was discussed, the great complaint that they interfered with the lowest and poorest classes and their dwellings was met by the answer, that whatever inconvenience should be inflicted, it would be more than compensated by the benefit conferred on the City at large by the creation of open spaces where there had been previously densely-crowded neighbourhoods, and by carrying into those localities a freer circulation of air. But now the attempt was made in the opposite direction, for in this case the property proposed to be taken was property occupied by the most respectable persons, and available to an immense mass of other persons living in the neighbourhood. It was an open space of more than three and a half acres in extent. He thought that their Lordships would be astonished if it were proposed to take Grosvenor Square, or Berkeley Square, or St. James's Square for a railway station, and to take every house for that purpose. Yet those squares were infinitely of less importance than Finsbury Circus to the densely crowded population of the City of London. It was proposed, two years ago, that Finsbury Circus should be taken for a great central station; but, in consequence of the resistance with which the proposal was met, the scheme was dropped. It was hard, however, upon private individuals that they should be called upon year after year to defend their rights; and unless Parliament gave some protection, they must ultimately succumb before the capital of these great companies. The arguments against this Bill were—First, that it would be injurious to the London Institution; next, that it would be injurious to a respectable class of persons who had taken and occupied houses in Finsbury Circus under the provisions of an Act which secured it as an open space; and, thirdly, that it would greatly inconvenience the poorest of the population in the neighbourhood, who would have no other place for recreation and exercise. He begged his noble Friend the President of the Council to look at the map while he explained to the House the various lines of railways which were planned to run into Finsbury Circus. In the first place, it appeared that there were thirty railways to be introduced into London itself, occupying a space of 132 miles. They were all supposed to be introduced in the present Session, and were all under the consideration of Parliament. The particular railway to which he wished to direct attention was the Great Eastern (New Metropolitan Station). The North London ran almost from due east to due west. There was a loop from it at right angles, which was a line sanctioned and in progress, and which ran to the immediate neighbourhood of the Circus. This Metropolitan Station line of the Great Eastern came away from the main line at Edmonton, crossed the North London at right angles, and ran side by side with the line already sanctioned to a terminus in Finsbury Circus, within 200 yards of the terminus of the other railway. Now, the rule upon which Parliament had always acted hitherto with regard to the metropolitan railways, was to secure the greatest possible amount of accommodation, at the least possible sacrifice of space; and their Lordships would hesitate to sanction a line which passed through a crowded part of the City, side by side with another line; but it was most important that these railways should be so constructed as to secure intercommunication, without the necessity of encumbering the streets with cabs and heavy waggons, carrying goods and passengers from one terminus to another. How was that object secured by this railway? Last year Parliament sanctioned the Metropolitan Finsbury-Pavement Terminus, which was only separated by about 63 feet from the proposed Great Eastern Terminus. That line was capable of being so connected with other lines as to give complete communication from north to south. Yet, while the level of the Metropolitan was 18 feet below the surface, the level of the Great Eastern was 19 feet above the surface, and their terminus was only at a distance of about 60 feet from the terminus of the Metropolitan. This Great Eastern scheme was resisted by all the inhabitants of the neighbourhood; it was opposed, for sound reasons, as impolitic; it held out no prospect of immediate advantages; it ran side by side with another railway already sanctioned, and it did not appear to possess any such merits as would induce their Lordships to give it a very favourable consideration. The House of Commons had taken the question of these metropolitan railways into serious consideration, and he understood that by an alteration of their Standing Orders the Metropolitan Board of Works were to be allowed for the first time to appear on behalf of the public before the different Committees; the object being that all the lines might be brought into harmony with one another, for the public benefit. He was not aware whether a similar power would be given by their Lordships. Of the thirty Bills, thirteen were to be first introduced here, and seventeen in the House of Commons. He was not aware how they were grouped; but it seemed to him that as one-half would be before their Lordships, and the other half before the House of Commons, it would be impossible to enter into the merits of the whole as one great scheme for intermetropolitan communication. It was quite true that the Board of Trade reported on all these railways, but only on them individually, and not on their merits as a means of through communication.

He wished to know whether it might not be possible so to group the different railways as to put before the same Committee, either in this or in the other House of Parliament, all those which were properly connected together, so that, having the Bills en masse, the Committee might judge better of the general merits of the scheme than they could if they were looking only to the merits of a single Bill. He felt very strongly inclined to move their Lordships to reject this Bill on the second reading. He should be glad to hear what could be said in favour of the project. He had not heard a word in its favour, but he was overwhelmed with applications to bring forward the cases of parties who alleged they would suffer by it. If their Lordships thought he had stated sufficient to reject the Bill for the present Session, with a view to ascertain in what manner general intercommunication could be established, he should be prepared to take the sense of the House upon it. If that were thought too strong a measure, the least which could be done was to postpone the second reading for a week or ten days, and in the mean time get a report from the Board of Trade upon the whole of the railways, not in the interests of the companies, but of the public.

EARL GRANVILLE observed, that the inconvenience complained of by the noble Earl was certainly no greater than that sustained by other parties who were affected by land being taken for railway purposes. [The Earl of DERBY: In other cases the preservation of the property and open spaces were not secured by Act of Parliament.] He agreed with the noble Earl that it would be very desirable for their Lordships to follow the example of the House of Commons, and adopt a Standing Order which would give the Metropolitan Board of Works a locus standi before Committees on these Bills, and he believed it would be a great advantage if some communication took place between the two Houses for the assimilation of their Standing Orders. The metropolitan railways, no doubt, would be a great public advantage, and the large number of schemes now before Parliament showed what extensive use the public had made of those already in existence. Though it was no part of his business to defend this particular Bill, even if he had possessed the capacity, he could not admit that it would be a fair thing to reject it on the second reading, as was suggested by the noble

Earl — who acknowledged, by the way, that he himself had only seen the arguments against the Bill, and knew nothing of what was to be said in its favour. But the second reading might be postponed for some little time, until noble Lords had had an opportunity of making themselves acquainted with its merits; and he could not conceive that there could be any objection to this course. He quite agreed with the noble Earl that it would be desirable to adopt a Standing Order, which would give the Board of Works a locus standi before Committees on such Bills; and also that the Board of Trade should be called on for a general report on the subject.

EARL GREY thought, with his noble Friend the Lord President that it would be taking an extreme step to reject the Bill summarily on the second reading, and preferred that it should be postponed for a short time. The question raised by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) was one of extreme importance. He thought, with the noble Earl (Earl Granville), that Metropolitan Railways were likely to be of immense advantage to the public, but all schemes for the purpose ought to be considered together and settled as a whole. He could not consent to submit Railway Bills in groups to a Select Committee of either House, formed as they were at present. Last year he acted as Chairman of a Committee on a group of Railway Bills; and though he gave all his attention to the question, he could not master the business in a manner satisfactory to himself. Therefore his experience in that capacity had convinced him that it was quite impossible for their Lordships adequately to discharge the duties imposed on them in those Committees. The interests of railway companies were becoming so complicated, and the questions raised by competing lines were so difficult and so important, that persons called upon to decide upon them with no more previous experience or knowledge than any of their Lordships could possess were placed in a very unsatisfactory position. The Committee over which he had presided had taken the greatest possible pains to investigate the matters laid before them, but even to the last he was not at all confident that their decision was a correct one. The present system of deciding these questions was most unsatisfactory. It was most important that the policy pursued by Parliament on these matters should be consistent; but how was it possible at present? A group of Railway Bills was submitted one year to one Select Committee, and the next Session the very same questions, in a slightly different form, were brought before a totally different Committee. The result was that the decisions of Committees were notoriously a mere matter of hazard, and companies and all persons interested in railway property were exposed to great hardships. It was said that the London and North Western Railway Company this year was compelled to watch 180 Bills, and the Great Northern 41, and the consequence would be an immense waste of money and a number of unsatisfactory decisions. These things had been much better managed in France, where the Government came to a general decision as to what lines it was desirable to construct, and they were constructed without any of that enormous competition the cost of which was always paid in the long run by the public. The interests of the railway companies themselves could not be a matter of indifference to their Lordships, for at the present moment their receipts amounted to between £26,000,000 and £27,000,000 a year. He could not agree that it would be satisfactory to refer the general subject of Metropolitan Railways to the Board of Trade. The reports made by that Board to Parliament on private Bills had been found to be practically useless, for Committees refused to be guided by reports drawn up in secret by a Department which did not hear the parties. Nothing would ever do but the creation of some competent, well-constituted tribunal which would sit in public, hear the witnesses and counsel, which would pursue a regular settled policy, and would sit all the year round, so that the railway business might not be hurried through in a few weeks. On the advice of such a tribunal Parliament might legislate for railways, just as it now legislated for Inclosures, under the advice of the Inclosure Commissioners. By some such arrangements as this, matters would be put upon a much more satisfactory footing than at present. It was clear, from the number of Bills before Parliament, that a great extension of Railway Bills was most probable, and it was to be hoped that Parliament would not now repeat the mistakes of 1845 and 1846. Owners of property had certainly some right to ask Parliament for protection against the oppression to which they might now be subjected by companies bringing the same schemes year after year before Committees on the chance at last of getting a favourable decision; and such a tribunal as he had suggested might have power to give costs against companies which persisted in putting private proprietors to renewed expenses after a project had once been inquired into and finally decided. The time of Parliament was not likely to be much occupied with other important business this Session, and he therefore thought it would be advisable for their Lordships to take this matter into their serious consideration, with the view of adopting some remedy for the evils which he had attempted to describe.

LORD REDESDALE reminded their Lordships that he had for years been urging on the House the necessity of a properly constituted Railway Board. It was his opinion that neither the interests of the public nor those of railway companies themselves could be properly attended to without the constitution of such a tribunal; and he believed that railway companies, which had formerly shown themselves hostile to such a proposition, were now disposed to view it with favour. To be of any good, such a Board must have great powers. If not, it would not be respected and would not be attended to; and, whatever powers were given to it, must, in the main, be supported by Parliament. He was convinced that both railway companies and the public would be saved a great deal of expense by the action of such a Board; and, as regarded the general interests of the public in respect to railway schemes, there was no part of the kingdom in which they presented a stronger case than in the metropolis, particularly at the present time, when schemes for connecting all the lines coming into London were in progress, either as plans to be laid before Parliament, or as works in actual construction. He held that such a connection could not be carried out in a proper manner by means of a number of different systems carried out by different companies. It could best be accomplished by one general plan. It was possible to have too many lines running through the metropolis. What they wanted was the greatest amount of railway accommodation with the smallest number of lines. With regard to the Metropolitan Railway, which had been so great a success, it struck him that it might hereafter become an insuperable difficulty in matters of sewerage and other such undertakings if underground lines through the metropolis were not carried out on some general plan ; and he did not think that their Lordships had sufficient information on those underground schemes at present to enable them to legislate on them in a satisfactory manner. The scheme now under consideration was not one for an underground railway ; but, however convenient it might prove for the company which was promoting it and for certain other companies, it was not clear to him that as a metropolitan line it possessed very great advantages, seeing that it would run nearly parallel with a line for which a Parliamentary sanction was obtained last year. That, however, was a question on which their Lordships were scarcely in a position to give a final decision at that moment. But there was another consideration. It was proposed to take Finsbury Circus and make use of it for railway purposes. Were their Lordships prepared to sanction a proposal to do away with the only open space in a crowded part of the metropolis at a time when the State was almost giving premiums to procure places of public recreation ? There was the less necessity for this, inasmuch as the railway company could procure a site within 200 yards of the Circus itself, which would answer the purposes to which it was proposed to apply that open space. The Metropolitan Board of Works wanted to come forward in defence of the public interests ; but its appearance by counsel before a Committee would add to the expenses of all parties. If their Lordships should arrive at the conclusion that Finsbury Circus ought not to be occupied, the kindest thing they could do, even for the promoters, was to throw out the Bill on the second reading. He did not ask them to do so at once ; but, in order to give time for further consideration, he should move that the debate be adjourned for a fortnight.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE was of opinion that the Underground Railway should be cherished by the inhabitants of the metropolis. It had many advantages that were possessed by no other line in the kingdom—it had both the broad and the narrow gauges ; it had spacious stations, and it was covered in from the effects of climate. His own opinion was that all the railways which it was proposed to run through the metropolis should be compelled to keep underground. The question, then, under consideration by their Lordships was one of great moment, for much future inconvenience was sure to be caused to the public if some general plan applicable to all the connecting railways were not adopted. If, in the first instance, the great trunk lines of the kingdom had been marked out in accordance with a uniform plan, much better lines than those which existed might have been constructed ; but the character of this country was, if he might use the term, so republican that it was thought every company should do as it liked, and that Parliament should judge of each scheme as it came before it. As to the Board proposed by his noble Friend (Lord Redesdale), he feared it would entail a great deal of expense on the public ; and he did not see why the functions which were sketched out for it might not be performed by a branch of the Board of Trade. He had great confidence that this debate would lead to some general measure of great importance to the metropolis.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he was not disposed to press for the absolute rejection of this Bill, and was quite willing to acquiesce in the suggestion that the consideration of the question should be postponed for a fortnight, and that meanwhile the Board of Trade should be requested to prepare such a Report as would enable their Lordships to form a better opinion upon the merits of the case. It should be understood, however, that the Board would report, not merely upon the merits of this particular line, but of this line taken in connection with those schemes generally. He hoped, also, that the Government would consider whether some tribunal might not be constituted in order to check the variety of projects now brought before Parliament, interposing their deliberate judgment in the introduction of these schemes, and thereby giving to Parliament some more effectual guide and assistance than was now afforded.

EARL GREY suggested that there was great difficulty in calling upon the Board of Trade at such short notice for a Report upon a question of such magnitude. He did not think that the Board of Trade possessed the machinery or the means of coming in so short a time to a sound conclusion upon a matter of such importance ; and, in his opinion, the wisest course would be, as had been suggested, to postpone all those schemes for a year, meanwhile appointing a Commission with powers to hear counsel, to examine parties upon oath, to consider the various schemes brought forward, and to submit to Parliament in their Report some definite plan on the subject.

LORD REDESDALE agreed with the noble Earl in thinking that the Board of Trade could not consider so large a question in a fortnight.

Further Debate upon the said Motion adjourned to Monday the 9th of March next.

GARDENS IN TOWNS PROTECTION BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for the Protection of certain Garden or Ornamental Grounds in Cities and Boroughs—Was presented by The Lord REDESDALE; read 1st; to be printed; and to be read 2^d on Thursday next. (No. 14.)

A Bill to amend the Law relating to the Royal Naval Coast Volunteers—Was presented by The Duke of SOMERSET; read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 19.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET :—I have to apologize to the House for alluding to a matter personal to myself, and I will do so in a very few words. I have likewise to apologize for having spoken with regard to this affair on Friday night, when the noble Lord to whom I am about to allude was absent. I was informed on Friday last by several hon. Gentlemen whom I met in the street that a very personal attack had been made upon my public character by the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdon (Lord R. Montagu). I went home and read the paragraph in the paper, which certainly appeared to me to require some answer. There was not only an attack on the Lord Lieutenant of the county of Kent (Viscount Sydney), but an attack upon me in my public capacity as Secretary to the Admiralty. I thought it my duty, at the request of the Lord Lieutenant, to come down to the House on Friday, at four o'clock. Unfortunately, the noble Lord was not in his place; but I thought it my duty to contradict the statement of that paragraph with reference to the appointment of Mr. Budden to a captaincy of Volunteers, and I will therefore say nothing more about it now. But, on the same occasion, I am given to understand that the noble Lord expressed to the House that I had, holding an official public appointment, attended political meetings at Chatham with a view to induce the electors of Chatham to vote for a brother-in-law of mine, Mr. Otway. I was informed by several Gentlemen that that was the tone and tenor of the noble Lord's observations. If the noble Lord has been misunderstood, I shall be extremely glad to hear it. I was also informed that on an occasion when I went to Chatham the noble Lord had stated as a fact that I had taken a special train to go down to Chatham, apparently hinting that I had charged that special train to the Government account. Now, I wish to state in a very few words what did take place. In the month, I think, of November last, I was invited by the High Constable of Chatham to meet a large party of naval and military officers at dinner, amongst whom was my gallant Friend the Member for Chatham. I took a return ticket and went down to Chatham and attended the dinner, and a very good dinner it was. It fell to my lot, being the senior naval officer present, to have to return thanks for the navy. And I did return thanks for the navy. I expatiated on the agreeable nature of the company; that there were no politics, happily, to be introduced at the meeting; and I likewise congratulated them upon the fact that some day or other Chatham would be the finest arsenal in the world. Now, that was the whole of the speech. My gallant Friend the Member for Chatham returned thanks on that occasion for the army, and did me the honour to pay me a higher compliment than I deserved. The evening wore on, and that part of the company who had to return to London were about to leave to take the latest train, when the worthy and munificent High Constable informed us that a special train had been placed at our disposal; and we gratefully availed ourselves of the offer. I went down with Sir Henry Drummond Wolff and Mr. Otway, and returned with them to London. No politics were introduced, and that was the only occasion of my visiting Chatham. Now, I appeal to the House whether, under the circumstances, I deserve to be under the censure which the noble Lord has been pleased to throw upon me.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: The noble Lord has defended himself, or attempted to defend himself, certainly without rancour, that which, if he will permit me to say so, he committed with a great deal of rashness. I think, however, that on this occasion he has left unanswered many points to which I alluded, and by doing so has admitted their correctness. I had expected and hoped that he would have endeavoured to clear himself from the suspicion of unconstitutional conduct, yet he appeared entirely to let the case rest upon what I did or did not assert about Lord Sydney, and what I might have said, or might not have said, concerning himself. It appears to me, that that is not at all the question. The question for the House is, whether the noble Lord did or did not act in a legal and constitutional manner? What does it matter to the country, whose business we are here to transact, whether I said certain things of him or of the Lord Lieutenant of the county? The country will not care one farthing what was said by a Member who has not been three years in the House, who never held any office, and whose individual opinion is of no account either in the country or in the House. The question about which the country will care, and to which, therefore, he ought to have directed his attention is, whether as a Member of this House, he did or did not act in a legal and constitutional manner? I appeal to the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham whether what I said was or was not correct; and I further ask him to support me now if I am right, and to correct me if I am wrong. But the noble Lord trotted very lightly over the main assertions of my speech, like a man walking barefooted over sharp flints, as if he did not care to bear upon them, for fear of committing himself one way or the other. First, with regard to Lord Sydney, what I said was this—and

Lord Clarence Paget

I carefully guarded myself—that application had been made to him by Mr. Budden, (who became afterwards High Constable of Chatham), for a captaincy of Volunteers, and that Lord Sydney had refused the application on the ground that Mr. Budden was a canteen-keeper. I see by the reports in the papers, that I was understood to use the word “co-termonger;” and as the reporters are remarkably accurate, I suppose I did so; but then all I can say is, that it was a lapsus linguae. However, that did not apply to Lord Sydney. He refused the captaincy; the dinner was given to the noble Lord opposite, and after that Mr. Budden received the captaincy. I merely stated the facts. I drew no inference. I never, for one moment, said that those facts were connected together. These are the words:—“The Lord Lieutenant, he was informed, refused, observing that the person in question was a mere co-termonger.”

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord is not in order in reading extracts from a report of a debate in this House. I am very sorry to interfere in a matter which appears to be of the nature of a personal explanation; but the explanation of a single point which the noble Lord may think due to himself, does not afford him the opportunity of entering into a general statement.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: Then I will put myself in order by ending with a Motion. The noble Lord may attack me in the House, that I do not care about; but what I do care about, and what the noble Lord does not appear to care about, is whether he has acted legally and constitutionally, or not? That is the point on which I want the House to judge between us. The noble Lord seems to feel that there is some secret link of association which will connect those two facts together in the mind of every person. Unless he thought there was a connection between the dinner at Chatham and the Lord Lieutenant giving Mr. Budden the office that he desired, why should he have come down to the House and, as it were, raised this tempest in a tumbler? But it is clear that he was conscious that there was some influence used. I do not say the noble Lord himself applied to the Lord Lieutenant—but I say that the Lord Lieutenant was naturally anxious to oblige his brother-in-law. I never said that Mr. Budden was not a respectable individual. I am quite aware that he is so; but he had this disadvantage in the noble Lord's eyes: he was a most strenuous supporter of the Conservative Member for Chatham; and when any one sees those civilities done to another party, he naturally supposes that the object is to detach the individual from the side he had served so long. The noble Lord says I asserted that he went on several occasions to Chatham on political matters. I did not understand that he took his inspiration from a newspaper. I saw only two newspapers, in neither of which I was reported to have used the words which he puts into my mouth. He has been misinformed. I merely said he went down to the dinner. What I said with regard to the special train was that the noble Lord did return by a special train, and that I wondered how it was paid for. I did not assert that it had been charged to the Government account. Although I did ask whether, after all these uncalled for civilities to Conservative electors, it had been taken out of the Civil Contingencies; but this I said by way of joke, without any intention of imputing to the noble Lord any dishonourable conduct. The noble Lord has passed over the most important part of the charge I made against him—that he went to Chatham and promised the electors that Chatham should become “the greatest naval arsenal in the world.” [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: No!] I hold the report of his speech in my hand. The statement is not, as the noble Lord alleged, that “some day or other” such would be the case:—it was a positive promise, that “Chatham should become one of the most important naval stations in the world;” that “Chatham was about to possess one of the most important naval arsenals;” that “the basin accommodation at Chatham would be made to surpass all that was to be found in Cherbourg, or in any of the ports of France.” Was he not then making a promise to Chatham that it was to have the greatest arsenal in the world, and basin accommodation that should surpass that at Cherbourg? Was not that promising that the House should expend millions of money at Chatham? Would our forefathers have allowed even a King or Queen to promise a large expenditure of public money on any dockyard? Would the House sanction such lavish promises and vows to be made in their name? Would they permit the little engrossers of delegated power to do that which our forefathers would not have suffered in the prerogatives of Royal authority? Of course, the noble Lord was received with cheers at Chatham; and of course warmly welcomed when he made such a promise of the expenditure of public money to their town. He said our navy was never in a better condition for entering into war with the French. The hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) is not here, or he would, I have no doubt, have taken up the cudgels on that point. What right has the noble Lord to go down to Chatham and make irritating remarks concerning the French nation? It may be said that this was only a little indiscretion; but if so, it is only another instance of what we heard so much of last year, and which was known as Ministerial mud-larking. This House has always been most jealous that a Minister should not use his patronage to turn the votes of electors; and yet I appeal to the House whether those words of the noble Lord were not calculated to buy over the electors of Chatham to his side? It may be said that an election was not imminent; but I ask whether every hon. Member of this House did not then entertain the expectation of a general election at an early period of the present Session? And it was then that the noble Lord went down to Chatham and made those promises to the electors. I will not detain the House further, but this I say, that the noble Lord has not defended himself on the only point upon which he was open to attack—namely, that he acted unconstitutionally and illegally; and I think it is the duty of some of the noble Lord's Colleagues to defend him, if he can be defended, on that point. I move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That this House do now adjourn.”

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that having been referred to by both the noble Lords, he wished to say a few words. With respect to the appointment of Mr. Budden to a captaincy of Volunteers, he desired to state his belief that Mr. Budden was one of the most charitable and respectable men in the county of Kent. He contributed a large sum towards the Volunteer movement, and entered the 9th company of the East Kent Volunteers as a private—the corps, in fact, owed its existence to him; and he became so popular in the corps that they recommended him to the Lord Lieutenant for a captaincy. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty was in error on one point. He said that Mr. Budden occupied a more important position when appointed to the captaincy than when the application to appoint him was refused. This was the reverse of the fact. Mr. Budden had twice before served the office of High Constable of Chatham. It was when he first served the office that his name was brought before Lord Sydney, who then refused to make him a captain of Volunteers. He did not know why Lord Sydney refused, but he certainly thought that he was wrong in that refusal. Mr. Budden was elected High Constable of Chatham for the third time, and it was on his going out of office that he gave the usual dinner to the court-leet, at which the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty was present. It was a week or a fortnight after he had gone out of office that Mr. Budden was appointed to the captaincy of a Volunteer company. It was for people to draw their own inferences as to the motive. With regard to the dinner, it was the practice of the High Constables to give one on going out of office. When he (Sir F. Smith) happened to be of the High Constable's way of thinking in politics, he was invited to be present; when otherwise, he was not invited. A few hours before the dinner he was told he was to have the pleasure of meeting the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty. He was astonished at the announcement. He was happy to meet that noble Lord anywhere—except, perhaps, at Chatham, and in the company of his (Sir F. Smith's) late, and probably his future, opponent for the representation of the Borough. He dared to say, if the invitation came again the noble Lord would not accept it, for there was not one person at the dinner who did not believe that his presence was a political move. On the late occasion the noble Lord, he was quite sure, accepted the invitation sent to him in his usual off-hand good-natured way, and without thinking much of the consequences. And what were those consequences? The consequences were these:—There was hardly a man in that meeting, who was an elector of Chatham, who did not believe that the presence of the noble Lord arose out of political motives. The noble Lord had his brother-in-law by his side, who was likely to be a future candidate for the suffrages of the constituency, and as Secretary of the Admiralty, the noble Lord held the patronage of the dockyard. Under the circumstances the inference was inevitable. The noble Lord came in company with his brother-in-law (Mr. Otway), and they all knew that the Secretary to the Admiralty had the patronage of the dockyards. However, the noble Lord's presence at such a meeting was not of much importance; for the constituency of Chatham was so pure that it would resist all entreaties, even when coming in the honeyed language of the noble Lord. [Laughter.] He would prove that the constituency were pure. He had sat three times for Chatham, and his brother once. They had carried on terrific contests three times against the Government and once with the Government, and he could not lay his hand on the name of a single man who had changed from one side to the other in consequence of the influence of the Government. If that did not bespeak the purity of electors, he did not know what did: they were all to a man true to their colours. When, therefore, it was proposed to deprive the electors of Chatham of their franchise, as was once contemplated by the Government of the day, he thought that a great injustice would have been done to them by such a measure. He thought the House might forget the noble Lord's escapade—for himself, he confessed he wished the noble Lord had not attended the dinner, for he could not help thinking that in that case the noble Lord's brother-in-law would come into the field at the next election with a much better grace. He thanked the House for listening to these remarks. He trusted that the Secretary to the Admiralty would forget the matter, as he should, but he hoped the noble Lord would not go to Chatham again.

Question put, and negatived.

SYDNEY BRANCH MINT.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, if Her Majesty's Government intend to act upon the recommendation of the Sydney Branch Mint Committee of last Session, for legalizing the circulation in the United Kingdom of the sovereigns coined at the Branch of the Royal Mint at Sydney?

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he wished also to ask whether Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer is aware of an Act of the Legislature of New South Wales by which a discriminating duty was imposed on the export of gold, and whether it is the intention of the Government to allow that Act to take effect?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that to reply to the second Question first, he had seen a Bill of the nature described by the hon. Member (Mr. T. Hankey), but he did not know the precise stage at which it had arrived in the colonial Legislature. With regard to the difference it established between coined and uncoined gold, apparently with the view of drawing business to the Sydney Mint, he would observe that the Bill did not make an innovation, but only reduced certain duties now in existence by their relative amounts. With regard to the Question put by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Alderman Salomons), he had to say that Her Majesty's Government had the disposition generally to give effect to the principal recommendations of the Committee of last Session with respect to the circulation of the colonial sovereign; but he did not wish to give so absolute a pledge on the subject as would preclude the Government from following any advice they might hereafter receive on a more public and general discussion of the subject, because, though it apparently did not involve any great results, yet it was one of considerable importance. It was his intention to have prepared a Bill for the purpose of embodying the views of Her Majesty's Government on the subject, but he had just learned that some circumstances had occurred in the Colony which bear, in an important degree, on the question of their taking immediate steps at home. It was the opinion of the Committee of last year that the Sydney sovereign should be made a legal tender in Great Britain, and an essential part of the arrangement would be that of making permanent provision in that Colony for the establishment of a mint which should be as permanent as though it was a part of the establishment on Tower Hill. He found that, owing to causes which might or might not be connected with the measure, the Bill for making a permanent provision of that character had just miscarried in the New South Wales Legislature, and it might therefore be desirable that they should take time to consider whether they should proceed further until they more precisely knew the intentions of the New South Wales Legislature with regard to this subject.

BRAZIL—MR. VEREKER.—QUESTION.

MR. LAIRD said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of the data upon which Mr. Christie, in his despatch to Earl Russell of the 6th November, 1862, founded his statement that it was "known to the Brazilian Government, as well as to his Lordship," that Mr. Consul Vereker, when he left Rio Grande do Sul, "was in a state of nervous excitement, with a delusion about attempts to assassinate him," and upon which the Marquis of Abrantes, in his note to Mr. Christie of the 20th October, was led to question Mr. Vereker's "infallibility respecting the discovery of crimes;" and, if so, whether there was any objection to lay the documents containing such data upon the table of the House, in continuation of the correspondence relating to Brazil just presented to Parliament by Her Majesty's command?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that he was afraid he should be unable to give any documents containing the data to which the hon. Gentleman alluded. The facts were simply these:—Mr. Vereker, a very zealous public servant, had been called upon to make great exertions owing to the misconduct of the Brazilian authorities, in the matter of the wreck of the "Prince of Wales." The excitement consequent upon what had taken place, together with the effects of the climate, were attended with such bad results upon his health that he was obliged to leave Brazil, labouring under a nervous excitement. Mr. Vereker, however, he was happy to say, was now quite recovered, and would return to his duties shortly.

BRAZIL—THE CAPTAIN OF THE "HOUND" AND THE DISPUTE WITH BRAZIL.—QUESTION.

MR. HUNT said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any Deposition or other Statement by the captain or any of the crew of the schooner Hound relative to the circumstances which led them to inform Mr. Stephens that five of the crew of the Prince of Wales had been murdered on the coast of Brazil, as narrated in No. 18 of the Correspondence presented to Parliament on that subject, was furnished to or applied for by the Foreign office; and, if not, to state the reason for such omission.

MR. LAYARD said, if the depositions of the captain and crew of the Hound had been thought of importance, Mr. Consul Vereker would have obtained them. He believed the vessel was wrecked on the bar at Rio Grande, and consequently at a considerable distance from Albardao. The information given by the captain and crew could only have been derived from what they had heard at Rio Grande.

MR. HUNT said, he wished to know whether any further information had been given by Mr. Stephens?

MR. LAYARD said, there had not.

FORTIFICATIONS AT GREAT YARMOUTH.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY TRACEY said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, Why the Batteries at Great Yarmouth, for which a site was chosen and the land purchased and paid for by Government in the year 1859, and of which the importance to the general trade of the country in the North Seas was pointed out by the Secretary at War in a correspondence with the Mayor of Great Yarmouth, have not been erected?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the harbour of Great Yarmouth was not included in the schedule of the Act on Fortifications, and it was not intended to make any proposal for erecting works there in the Army Estimates of the current year. The works on the Humber and Mersey were thought to deserve the attention of Parliament; but it was not considered necessary to take a Vote for Great Yarmouth.

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 1.] QUESTION.

MR. ESMONDE said, he wished to ask the hon. Member for Wexford, If, in consequence of the Irish Assizes at present commencing necessitating the absence of several Irish Members, he will postpone his Motion from Wednesday next to a later period?

MR. M'MAHON said, it was not his intention to consent to any postponement. If he postponed this Bill, there was no open day again till Easter Wednesday, which also happened to be All Fools' Day. If he were to postpone it, therefore, it would be virtually throwing it over. He would, however, press it through on Wednesday, take the report on Thursday, and the third reading, if possible, on Friday. He was anxious to save from poachers on the lower waters some portion of this year's salmon.

POLAND—REPORTED ARREST OF POLISH STUDENTS.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is true that three young Polish Students of the French College of St. Cyr, whose names are given, when travelling lately from Paris to Poland, through Prussia, were arrested by the Prussian police at Thorn, and delivered over to the Russians?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—Her Majesty's Government have no information at all upon the subject.

POLAND—THE RUSSIAN AND PRUSSIAN CONVENTION.—QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to know, Whether a Despatch has been received at the Foreign Office from Her Majesty's Representative at Berlin with reference to a certain Convention said to have been concluded between Russia and Prussia with respect to the insurrection in Poland; and, if so, whether there will be any objection to lay it on the table of the House?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that he was afraid the Government could not lay that Despatch upon the table. It did not contain a copy of the Convention, but only hearsay evidence with respect to it.

PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES' ANNUITIES BILL.—[BILL 30.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, in the debate upon the Resolutions on which the Bill was founded, he took occasion to state how much he regretted that the accounts upon which the Resolutions were based were not before the House. He still regretted that that information was not supplied, because he held it to be a sound principle that, whenever a grant of money out of the Consolidated Fund was proposed, it was the duty of the Government to enable every Member of that House to understand why they were called upon to vote the money required. It was a singular mode of transacting business that in the account of the proceedings of that House, upon the same night, a Vote for the expenditure of a considerable sum out of the Consolidated Fund should stand No. 40, and the information on the subject, which was placed on the table in about an hour after, should stand as No. 52. This was an awkward position in which to place Members; for whether the Vote was right or wrong, they were called upon to sanction it, without being able to explain to their constituents the reason for doing so. On a former night he took the liberty of saying that, on his marriage, Frederick Prince of Wales had £50,000 a year out of the Civil List of George II. This was perfectly true—he found that in the 10 Geo. II. the 8th section enacted, that as His Majesty had determined to grant that sum out of the Civil List to the Prince of Wales, the annuity should be free of land tax and other charges. Thus they knew as a fact that the original allowance of Frederick Prince of Wales was £50,000 a year, and not £100,000, though it was true that at a later period the allowance was increased. Since the present proposition was made, they had had the opportunity of reading the evidence on which it was founded, and it was obvious, whether £40,000, £50,000, or £60,000 were voted out of the Consolidated Fund, everything depended on the state of the revenues during the minority of the Prince of Wales. Having looked at the document presented to the House, he felt bound to say that he had never read one more creditable or more honourable to all concerned. The trustees had certainly most faithfully performed their duty; and the result showed, not as stated by the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, a net revenue of £60,000, but of something more, though perhaps not to any great extent; for he should be prepared to show that the revenue of the Duchy was £50,000 a year at present, with an accumulation of £600,000. However, the broad question was, whether the proposition submitted to the House was a reasonable one, and he had suspected from the first that it would prove to be so; and now, having considered the document which he had referred to, he came to the conclusion that the proposition was fair and reasonable. It was therefore with great pleasure that he gave his cordial assent to the Bill, and he expressed a hope that the Prince of Wales and Princess of Wales would long live to enjoy the income assigned to them.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that in the statement of the revenues of the Duchy he could not find that the accumulated fund of £600,000 was accounted for.

SIR WILLIAM DUNBAR stated, that after the expenses of managing the Duchy property were defrayed, and the public burdens imposed by Parliament and other necessary deductions were discharged, it had been the duty and the practice of the Council of His Royal Highness to pay over whatever surplus remained partly to the Prince's Treasurer, and partly to Trustees, who had from time to time invested the sums so paid over in the public funds. They then became part of His Royal Highness' Privy Purse, and the Council of the Duchy had nothing further to do with them. On the 9th of November, when the Prince attained his majority, the accumulation amounted to £593,000 in Three per Cents, the cash value of which was at that time £547,750. The monies paid to the Trustees having passed beyond the control of the Council of the Duchy, they considered that it was not within their province, even if they had possessed the necessary information for the purpose, to take cognizance of the disposal of monies so paid over, or investments made for the benefit of the Prince, and which properly belonged to his Privy Purse, when making a report to Her Majesty which had exclusive reference to the administration of the affairs of the Duchy of Cornwall.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he had the highest opinion of the character and moral qualities of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, but he felt—and he thought that the House and the country would also feel—that handing over to the Prince the uncontrolled command of the enormous sum arising from accumulations was not expedient or wise.

MR. WHALLEY observed, with respect to the marriage treaty, that it was remarkable for the omission of the word "Protestant" in describing the future Princess of Wales. He felt more confidence in saying that this matter deserved the attention of the House, inasmuch as on the occasion of the marriage of Her Majesty a like omission occurred, which induced the Duke of Wellington to point out in the House of Lords the importance of adhering to a description which was connected with the foundation of the constitution and of the dynasty, and to move an Amendment to the Address to the Queen, which resulted in the word "Protestant" being inserted. [3 Hansard, li. 14.] On the present occasion he had been saved the pain of interrupting the general harmony, because the House had received a statement from the noble Lord at the head of the Government, which was satisfactory to himself. But he had now to notice another difference between the marriage treaty of the Prince and Princess of Wales and the marriage treaty of the Queen and the late Prince Consort. The third article of the latter treaty provided that the sons and daughters of the marriage should be brought up according to the laws of Great Britain and Ireland, and that expression meant plainly enough that they were to be brought up in the Protestant religion. In the marriage contract of the Prince of Wales a similar clause was omitted. Why was it omitted? He was anxious that the silence of the House on this subject should not lead to the supposition that they were indifferent to the preservation of such an important landmark of the Constitution, or were prepared to dispense with any of those Protestant guarantees provided by the Bill of Rights.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he wished to know whether the allowances would be paid to the Prince and Princess of Wales without any deductions on account of income tax?

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he thought the House might be misled by a remark of the hon. Member for Lambeth. It was a mistake to imagine that the Prince of Wales would enjoy a large revenue from the accumulations over and above the £100,000 a year which he would derive from the ordinary revenue of the Duchy and the grant of the House. The £60,000, which was stated as the Prince's present income, was partly made up by returns from the accumulated fund. Indeed, even making allowance for those returns, he did not see how the amount was obtained; and his own impression, therefore, was that the proposition of the Government was rather under the mark. It must be remembered that the Prince's outfit would have to be paid for out of the accumulations, and would not cost much less than £200,000. His Royal Highness had to furnish Marlborough House, and to provide all those things which became the dignity of his position.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, it was quite open to the hon. Member, if he thought the Prince of Wales hardly used, to propose an increase of the Vote; but there was another way of looking at the matter, and that was to consider the £40,000 of public money. He held that the accumulations ought to be settled on the Duchy; and hon. Members would say, if a similar case occurred in private life, that it would be an unwise thing to give the heir the accumulations instead of settling them on the estate. He still maintained, as on the former occasion, that on the death of the eldest son of the Crown the Duchy of Cornwall reverted to the Crown for life, and did not pass to the next surviving son.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: When my hon. Friend the Member for Tavistock (Sir John Trelawny) rose, I was in hopes he was going to qualify the very strong statement he made the other evening. I feel bound to take notice of that statement, not because it involved a personal reference to myself, but because it would be a breach of duty on the part of the Government if they had neglected to inform themselves of the facts of the case. I think the hon. Member delivered himself with a confidence which the state of the case does not justify. I am far from undertaking to give the House a full explanation of the law with regard to the inheritance of the Duchy of Cornwall; but it appears to me, according to the information which I have been able to procure, that this is a question much more difficult to pronounce upon than my hon. Friend imagines. One thing, however, is quite clear, and that is that my hon. Friend is wrong in the very positive assertion which he made the other night, and has now repeated, that on every occasion when the Duke of Cornwall, being the eldest son of the King, dies, the Duchy and the revenues of the Duchy revert to the Crown. It is not at all difficult to confute that allegation; but I will not undertake to explain everything which has happened with regard to the succession and non-succession to the Duchy. The various cases do not seem to me to hang together on any very consistent principle; but no conclusion can be drawn from the facts at all agreeing with the statement of my hon. Friend. Thus much, however, is clear—on the death of Arthur, the eldest son of Henry VII., in the October following a Commission was issued under the Great Seal, not to determine, but to examine the question; and that Commission found that Henry (afterwards

Henry VIII.), the second-begotten son of the King, was Duke of Cornwall. [SIR JOHN TRELAWNY: Look at the charter of the Duchy.] The charter of the Duchy is not the supreme authority in the case. The succession is regulated by an Act passed in the reign of Henry V., and also by the course of practice at different periods of our history. The charter itself came under examination at a more recent period than the case I have already cited. On the death of Prince Henry, eldest son of James I., the charter was judicially considered, and the authorities of that day in the Privy Council again came to a conclusion opposite to that of my hon. Friend. The decision is thus given in Collins's Proceedings—

"In 1613 the question became the occasion of solemn inquiry before the King, and Lords, and others of the Privy Council, the Master of the Rolls, and the King's Counsel, when it was resolved that the words of limitation possessed the more extended meaning of filius primogenitus existens, and that upon the decease of Henry, Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall, Charles, Duke of York, had, both by reason and precedence, become entitled to the honour, style, and dignity of Duke of Cornwall, which he had and enjoyed accordingly."

There, at any rate, are two distinct precedents, and others might be given. I will not now go into the cases of Prince George (afterwards George II.), or of Prince George (afterwards George III.), eldest son of Frederick, Prince of Wales. I think I have said enough to show that the hon. Baronet was not justified in his very strong and positive statement.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, that he had been at great pains to examine the question, and the celebrated decision of Lord Tenterden supported the view he took.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—Sir, I wish to say a word or two as to the accumulations of the Duchy. As has been stated by my hon. Friend, the total value of the accumulations was £540,000 in money. Of that amount £220,000 has been spent in the purchase of the Norfolk estate, the produce of which is nominally £7,000, but effectively only about £5,000. The cost of the outfit of His Royal Highness is estimated at £100,000. It is calculated that the enlargement of the house at Sandringham, in order to render it suitable to the dignity of the Prince, will involve an outlay of £60,000. Thus we have £380,000 disposed of. Then there are, as is well known, a great number of farms belonging to the Duchy which have been let for "lives," and which are from time to time falling out of lease. The buildings and other appointments upon these farms require considerable repairs, the expense of which will probably amount to from £100,000 to £120,000. These items, therefore, go a good way to absorb the accumulations; and although the money spent in agricultural improvements may render the estates more valuable, there will be no immediate return, and the income will always be liable to certain fluctuations. Therefore my hon. Friend will see that the accumulation of £540,000 will give very little addition to the ordinary revenue of the Duchy. The difference between the ordinary revenue of the Duchy, £46,000, and the £80,000 which is the present income of the Prince of Wales is made up of the rents of the Sandringham estate and some other details. My hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), being the guardian of certain interests, has raised a question as to the treaty of marriage, which it is quite right should be properly attended to. I can assure him that the omission in the treaty, which he has noticed, does not involve any neglect of that fundamental principle of the British constitution, that the Sovereign and the Royal family must be of the Protestant religion. The treaty of the marriage of the Prince of Wales was founded precisely on that which was made on the marriage of Prince George, afterwards George IV., and as there was no mention in the latter of the article alluded to, it was not deemed necessary to insert it in the present treaty. It was in the marriage treaty of the Queen, but I think the hon. Member will admit that there is a leading principle distinguishing that case from this. A husband has a certain degree of domestic control over the education of his children, and where he is a foreigner it may be quite right that there should be a special article upon that subject. Where, however, the husband is the Prince of Wales, it has not been thought necessary to insert such a condition. But the hon. Member may be assured that there is not the smallest chance of the children of the approaching marriage—I hope there will be many—being educated in any other way than in conformity with the laws of the country and the principles of the Protestant faith. I have only to add, in conclusion, that the incomes of all the Royal family, without any exception, are subject to the income tax.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for To-morrow.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee of Supply read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CONFINEMENT OF LUNATICS.—HALL v. SEMPLE.—QUESTION.

MR. BUTT called attention to the recent case of Hall v. Semple in the Court of Queen's Bench, in which he said it was clearly proved that under a certificate signed by two doctors a perfectly sane man might be confined in a lunatic asylum, and asked the Home Secretary whether it was his intention to propose any alteration in the law relating to certificates required in cases of alleged insanity?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had communicated with the Commissioners in Lunacy on the case of Hall v. Semple, asking them whether, in their opinion, the evidence given on the trial suggested the necessity of any change in the law. They replied in the negative. The fact was, that the law was not observed in the case in question; the certificate, on the face of it, was irregular and not in conformity with law; and if the proprietor of the house to which Mr. Hall was taken had examined it, as he should have done, before admitting the alleged lunatic to his asylum, the case would not have occurred. The Commissioners thought the keeper of the asylum had been guilty of culpable neglect, and they had addressed a circular to all the proprietors of private asylums, calling their attention to the irregularity which had taken place. He hoped that the proceedings in the case of Hall v. Semple and the measures taken by the Commissioners would prevent the repetition of any such occurrence.

DEPORTATION OF NEGROES FROM EGYPT.—QUESTION.

MR. BUXTON rose to call attention to the purchase and deportation from Egypt of a Negro Regiment by the Emperor of the French. The facts of the case were, he believed, beyond denial. Last year, or at some previous period, the Emperor of the French arranged with Said Pasha, the late Pasha of Egypt, to hand over to him one or more battalions of his Negro soldiers. He understood that the Emperor applied for 1,500 men; however, only one battalion left Egypt before the death of the Pasha. The transaction was one of a very cruel character, for the conscription, as exercised in Egypt, was extremely harsh, and the way in which the Negro recruits were obtained was virtually a kind of slave trade. The Negroes were procured in the upper parts of Egypt by a sort of purchase from the chiefs, and he did not suppose there was a single Negro soldier in Egypt who was not serving against his own will. A conscription could only be excused as a measure of defence, and nothing could justify such a conscription as that he had described, where the soldiers, after being obtained with so much harshness, were sold to a foreign potentate, to be used in whatever manner he pleased. The intention in the present case was that the Negroes should be carried off to the most unhealthy parts of Mexico, there to discharge duties which it was thought French soldiers could not perform without destruction; though there was no reason for supposing that the Negro soldiers of Egypt would not equally suffer from the effects of the climate. It was matter of report what consideration the Emperor of the French gave for the Negroes. It might have been money, but with equal probability it might have been some other quid pro quo. The whole transaction, however, could be characterized as little less than a kind of slave trade. Whether purchased for money or not, the Negroes were taken from their homes and families without the smallest prospect of ever returning, and were carried off to perish in a distant country. It would be recollected that the Emperor of the French three or four years ago uttered a beautiful sentiment on the subject of the slave trade. France, he said, would no longer patronize the slave trade, because her mission was to march at the head of the civilization of the world; or something to that effect. The case of the Negro soldiers of Egypt afforded another proof of the fact that when the Emperor of the French delivered a noble phrase something was sure to follow immediately of a directly opposite character. ["Oh!"] At all events, the purchase and deportation of the Negro soldiers was an exceedingly base and cruel transaction, and he had only done his duty in calling attention to it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My hon. Friend has adverted to a transaction which certainly is a very irregular and unfortunate one, and which in some of the details of its execution is liable to greater censure than my hon. Friend has applied to it. The facts may be briefly stated. The French Government, finding that the exposure of French troops to the climate of Mexico, under certain conditions, was attended with great sickness, thought that by enlisting a certain number of Africans they might get persons more able from their constitution to undergo the trial to which their troops were unequal. They accordingly sent orders to their officers in Egypt to endeavour to enlist 1,000 Africans for service in Mexico. The late Pasha of Egypt was a man of very easy temperament, and was often disposed to go beyond the demands made upon him; and the system of administration in Egypt, I am sorry to say, is tainted in many respects with the barbarous usages of times gone by. Among those usages is the practice of compelling forced labour—the seizure of people, whether they will or no, for purposes of employment. Without any delay the Pasha ordered a regiment of 450 Nubians to leave the fortress where they were stationed, and march down to Alexandria, where they were forthwith embarked on board a French frigate, not knowing why or whither they were going. That was sufficiently irregular, because the Egyptian troops belong to the Sultan. The Sultan is the Sovereign of Egypt, and the inhabitants of Egypt are his subjects. It is not competent for the vassal of any Sovereign to dispose of any portion of his military force without the authority of the Sovereign himself. The Pasha, therefore, had no right whatever to send this regiment of Nubians to serve under a foreign Sovereign without the previous sanction and consent of his own superior. That, evidently, was very irregular, and was not probably the intention of the French Government, because their instruction was that an endeavour should be made to enlist freely a certain number of Africans for service in Mexico, which was to be accepted or declined as the Nubians thought fit. But, not content with this irregularity, the Egyptian Government committed an act which is exactly similar in violence and cruelty to that which has lately been committed in Warsaw. They sent their people out to the streets and quays of the towns, and seized every black man whom they thought fit for military duty or hard labour, without reference to what their former employment had been, tore them away from their homes and families, and embarked them on board a French frigate bound for Mexico. I am speaking, of course, of Nubians, not whites; but Negroes have homes and families as well as their neighbours, and the same attachment to the place of their birth. I cannot help believing that the French Government, who have expressed so strong a condemnation of the system practised in Warsaw and other Polish towns—the system, namely, of seizing people arbitrarily for service in the Russian army—will feel that an act of exactly the same cruelty, or perhaps even worse—for the Nubians were to be carried off to an unhealthy climate instead of being distributed among the quarters of the Russian army—has been perpetrated in a manner very different from that which they intended, and that, as far as it may be in their power to repair the wrong, they will do so. Her Majesty's Government have expressed to the Government of France their opinion that the transaction was irregular, that it was a violation of the rights of the Sultan, and that the Pasha of Egypt was not entitled to dispose of the subjects of the Sultan without the Sultan's consent.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF DOCKYARD POLICE.—AMENDMENT.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE rose to call attention to the case of the three superintendents of dockyard police at Pembroke, Gosport, and Chatham. The case he desired to place before the House was this:—When, in 1860, it was considered desirable to alter the arrangement with regard to the police at the dockyards of Pembroke, Portsmouth, and Chatham, by placing them under the management of the metropolitan police, the three superintendents of police who had filled the offices with credit and attention for twenty-six years, and who had entered the navy, one of them in the year 1803 and the other two in 1805, were superannuated upon the full pay of their respective offices, receiving, in addition to their half-pay, which amounted to £127 15s., pensions of £174 per annum granted by the Lords of the Treasury. These pensions they enjoyed from October, 1860, until June, 1861, when their allowances were suddenly reduced by £108 per annum, causing them of course great and serious inconvenience. One gentleman, being a single man, had engaged to allow to his sister and her family the sum of £72 per annum; but after this reduction he would have great difficulty in meeting that engagement. So convinced were the Admiralty of the injustice which had been done to these officers that they had repeatedly applied to the Treasury upon the subject, and it was only as a Department quarrel that the matter now came before the House. He believed that the Secretary of the Treasury would, in defence of the course which had been adopted, point to a rule in the Superannuation Act; but he should call upon the House to say by a division whether, in a case like this, the provisions of that Act ought to be strictly adhered to, or whether they should not ask Her Majesty to restore to these gentlemen the full amount of their pensions as originally granted, with all the arrears which were now due to them. The hon. and gallant Gentleman concluded by moving—

"That this House will To-morrow resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the three Superintendents of Dockyard Police who were superannuated on the abolition of their offices be restored to the scale of pension which was originally awarded to them."

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will To-morrow resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the three Superintendents of Dockyard Police who were superannuated on the abolition of their offices be restored to the scale of pension which was originally awarded to them,"

—instead thereof.

MR. PEEL said, that he deeply regretted the inconvenience and disappointment which these officers might have experienced from the mode in which their claims to pensions had been dealt with; but he thought he should be able to satisfy the House that the course taken by the Treasury was the unavoidable course under the circumstances, and strictly in accordance with what was contemplated by the Act of Parliament relating to compensations. The hon. and gallant Member had correctly stated that the appointments held by these officers and others were abolished when the dockyard duty was transferred to the metropolitan police. The claims of persons entitled to superannuation were submitted to the Treasury on printed forms intended to elicit information on various subjects, and, among others, whether the applicants are in receipt of half-pay or compensation allowances of any kind. As it appeared from the printed particulars of the case of these officers, that they were not receiving anything in the shape of half-pay at the time, the grant from the Treasury was fixed according to the ordinary scale of 1-60th of their civil salary for every year they had served. These officers had served twenty-six years, and ten years additional were granted as compensation for abolishing their offices, making their total pensions equal to 36-60ths of their civil salary. Their salary being £250, with a house of the estimated value of £40, they became entitled, according to this scale, to a pension of £174, which was accordingly granted in December, 1860. About five months afterwards, Captain Grey, Superintendent of Telegraphs to the Admiralty, who was pensioned in 1848, wrote to request that his case might be reconsidered, on the express ground that the officers in question had received pensions for their civil service, irrespective of the half-pay to which they were entitled. That statement took the Treasury entirely by surprise, but they lost no time in inquiring of the Admiralty whether it was true, as stated, that these officers were in receipt of half-pay; and it turned out that such was the case, some misunderstanding with regard to the printed forms having taken place, and the officers not having been in receipt of half-pay at the time they sent in their replies to the Treasury. Under these circumstances the case fell under the provisions of the Superannuation Act, which distinctly and peremptorily provided that no officer receiving half-pay should obtain a pension in respect of his civil services larger than would amount with his half-pay to two-thirds of his civil salary. The Treasury, therefore, were obliged to retain in their hands the amount in excess of this scale which had been improperly granted, and in adopting this course they had no discretion whatever, as the wording of the Act was imperative. If these officers were allowed to receive their half-pay in addition to the pension granted by the Treasury, the result would be that they would now be in receipt of a larger income than they had been during their twenty-six years of active duty.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE asked the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, whether that Department had not repeatedly pressed upon the Treasury the propriety of making some concession in favour of these officers?

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

QUESTION.

MR. LINDSAY, in calling attention to the state of the transport service, with the view of inquiring why it was that the recommendations of the Transport Committee of 1860-1 had not been carried into effect, stated that the Committee in question unanimously resolved to recommend that some important changes should be made in the mode in which it was conducted, and recommended its consolidation. That service now, and for several years, had been conducted by various Departments—the Admiralty had one portion, the India Board another, the Emigration Board another, and occasionally the War Office and the Commissariat each another. The consequence was that these different Government Departments were continually bidding against each other in the open market, and thus they had five Departments doing the work which a single Board would effect on much more economical terms. The changes which the Committee recommended were for the consolidation of this branch of the service, and to ensure more direct responsibility; for if a complaint was made now, the Admiralty referred the party to the War Office, who sent him to the India Board, who, very probably, referred him back to the Admiralty. The state of things was now just what it was at the commencement of the Crimean war. There had been no change since that time; and if we were unfortunate enough to be involved in a great war with such another Power as Russia, there would be the same confusion as in 1854. What was the use of this House appointing a Committee if their recommendations were not attended to? The Committee in question sat two Sessions, and unanimously agreed that certain changes should be made; yet three years had elapsed and beyond some slight alterations no changes had been effected. He hoped to hear from the noble Lord that some arrangements had been made for carrying out the recommendations of the Select Committee; or, if that had not been done, the House should know why those recommendations had been allowed to lie dormant for the last three years. He was glad to find that there was a reduction in the Navy Estimates of £1,000,000, but he must say that he should have been still more gratified if there had been a reduction of another million.

MR. BENTINCK said, that if his hon. and gallant Friend (Lord Clarence Paget) gave good reasons for this reduction, he should join the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) in rejoicing at it; but he must say, that as far as he knew the state of things which existed at present in foreign countries, he could see no reason for rejoicing in the proposed reduction. What had been the course of things in that House for years upon this subject, and which he was afraid was likely to continue for many years to come? It had been acknowledged, for many years, that the naval defences of this country were inadequate, and that the introduction of a new description of vessels must necessitate a great additional expenditure on the navy. The country had submitted to this additional outlay for the sake of the security of the country. And what now happened? It seemed of necessity that there should be alternations of hot and cold fits over the House in reference to the expenditure for the navy; the cold fit seemed now to be coming on, and there was to be a reduction in the Estimates. Now, what was the reason for these reduced Estimates? He did not attach much importance to what he heard out of doors, but still he would mention that he had heard two reasons suggested for the reduction. In the first place, it was said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was not much disposed to encourage expenditure for objects of this kind, had insisted upon large reductions in the Army and Navy Estimates; and then, further, there was the rumour that the Government were apprehensive of a certain coalition, which, if it had ever been possible, could only have been entered into in disregard of the interests of the country. If this reason had had any influence in reducing the Estimates, he must venture to think that the Government had been under a misapprehension of the risk likely to arise from such a source. He did not think that the House would have supported any such combination for attacking the Government upon the ground that they were laying out too much money for the defence of the country, and he believed that they would have followed a more prudent and popular course if they had maintained the naval expenditure at its present rate—always assuming that that rate was necessary to efficiency. If, however, good grounds could be shown for making the reduction, he should be glad to hear that it had been found possible to make it. Now, what would be the effect of this reduction? Why, the same thing that had happened over and over again before—that having laid out large sums of money to put our naval defences in a state of efficiency, all at once the cold fit comes upon the House, and suddenly, apparently without rhyme or reason, large reductions are made. And the result of this was, that upon the occurrence of any feeling of panic in the country, or upon some sudden emergency happening, the Government were compelled, in order to replace that which they had lost by reduction, to spend five times as much money as it would have cost to keep the navy in a state of efficiency. Work that had to be done in a hurry was always badly as well as expensively done. This was strikingly illustrated by what happened after the great reduction in the Navy Estimates in 1836. Every shilling of reduction on that occasion ultimately cost the country many pounds. Seeing the enormous expense of what was mis-called economy, he contended that they had a right to have clear and explicit reasons for reduction before they could say that it was justified by the circumstances. Another matter to which he wished to refer was this. He found that there were to be no further contracts for the construction of large iron-sheathed ships, though he did not mean to say that those which were now in course of construction were not to be completed. Now, a great deal of time was required for the construction of ships of this kind and if an emergency should arise; which rendered a large number of such ships necessary, the work would be done in a much more expensive and at the same time in a much worse manner than if done at leisure.

He had no doubt he should be told that there was no necessity for building iron-sheathed ships, because we had as many of that class as the French had; but that seemed to him to be a very unsound and dangerous argument, for this country was not in a proper position of defence when it was merely on an equality with France. In considering naval matters they of course always had in their minds the contingency of a war with France, for that was the next greatest naval Power; but it should be borne in mind that a war with France would have the effect of bringing this country into a state of war with other countries. In the event of a war with France the Northern States of America would, if they had a man or a dollar left, instantly go to war with us; and he therefore ventured to think that it was a dangerous argument to say that we did not want more iron-sheathed ships because we had as many as France had. He hoped he might be allowed to say a few words in reference to the French navy. He found that there was a great deal going on in the French dockyards which was never adverted to in that House. He wished to tell the House that there was a particular class of vessels building in the French dockyards in great numbers. They were building these vessels—he did not say with any present intention of going to war with this country, and, indeed, he believed that that was not the present intention of the French Emperor, whose object he thought was to keep at peace with us—but this impression was no ground why we should not look closely into their means of aggression in the event of war happening. He had taken the trouble to ascertain the facts from an authentic source, and he found that they were constructing in the French dockyards a large number of cavalry transports of very great tonnage and horse power, admirably fitted up for carrying between 300 and 400 horses each and a certain number of troops in addition. There would be, at the end of this year, forty-four of these vessels complete and ready for sea, and he had it upon the authority of the officials in the French dockyards, that they hoped in a very short time to have one of these vessels named after every Department in France. He should like to know for what possible purpose the French Government could deem it necessary to go to the enormous expense of building this particular class of vessels, except for the purpose of being able to act efficiently in the event of circumstances compelling them to go to war with this country. Could anybody suggest any other country into which France could ever want to send a large force of cavalry by means of such vessels. Not certainly to Mexico; nor could they want them to convey cavalry into Italy or across the Rhine; and he should like to know what the impression of the Government was as to what could be the intention of the French Government? It seemed they could only be utilized in an invasion of England. There was another point which he should wish to call attention to. He had had an opportunity, during last summer, of inquiring as to the number of workmen and artificers employed in the French dockyards; and he might mention that they made no secret of the matter—everything was perfectly straightforward and open, and every one was quite ready to tell you all you wished to know. He found that the artificers and labourers in the whole of our dockyards were 10,700 odd, and altogether, perhaps, there might be 12,000 or 13,000 persons employed; whilst in the two dockyards of Brest and Rochefort alone there were 11,000—there were Cherbourg, L'Orient, and Toulon besides. No doubt it would be said that the French were not exceeding us in their expenditure in their dockyards, because their navy did not cost as much as ours; but when this was said, hon. Gentlemen never adverted to the fact that the cost of labour in this country was somewhat more than double what it was in France, the exact proportion being this—that in France the cost was 2-5ths of what it was in this country. They had, therefore, in two out of five or six dockyards in France, nearly as many workmen as there were in the whole of our dockyards; and he was bound to say that there was more actual work done in France, with the same number of men, than in England. Another thing which must be borne in mind was that the French required but few vessels, compared with what we required for colonial purposes. He wished to avert to one other point. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) had told them that Committees of that House were useless; and the most glaring example of their inutility was the Committee appointed to inquire into the system pursued by the Board of Admiralty. He contended, that so long as the present constitution of the Board of Admiralty continued, it was impossible—even whilst giving the Board credit for its best intentions—that a wise, judicious, and economical expenditure could ever be established. Well, then, what do they do? They usually went contrary to the practice adopted in every other Department of business, which was to select for the head of the Department a person most likely to know something about it. After having elected some gentleman to preside at the head of the Admiralty, without reference to the knowledge and ability necessary for the efficient discharge of the duties, they then appointed a certain number of naval Lords who had virtually the direction of the Board without its responsibility. The responsibility really rested with the First Lord, who might be a person utterly unacquainted with the details of the Department. That distinguished functionary was compelled, for the first year or two of his official existence, to lean for support and advice upon the professional men who were in his confidence. What happened next? Just as this high official was becoming somewhat acquainted with the details of his Department a change took place in the arrangements of the Government, and he was turned out of office, to be replaced by another distinguished politician, equally ignorant of the duties of his vocation, and compelled to place himself under the direction and advice of others in order to learn his business. Now, so long as the Board of Admiralty was made a political job office it would be impossible to have any one continuous or consistent system of expenditure or any continuous system of control over it. Even under the present system, with the First Lord fully acquainted with all the details of his office, thoroughly competent to discharge its duties with the greatest efficiency, and assisted by Lords possessed of the necessary knowledge and ability, the Board was liable to the contingency of being changed in a short time. Under such circumstances, the principle invariably acted upon by the succeeding Board was to upset the system of its predecessor, and to adopt a different system altogether. The dockyard authorities, whose extravagance demanded some supervision, were always too glad to encourage this change of officers, in order to save themselves from that supervision which they so much dreaded. So long as such a system lasted, it was impossible to establish any efficient or effective investigation into those sources of extravagance which were constantly at work in all our dockyards. A Committee sat upon this subject some few years ago. He dissented from the Motion for the appointment of such Committee, believing that it would prove utterly useless. The result proved the truth of his prediction. The Committee was composed almost exclusively of officials and ex-officials; so that, in fact, it became a body of men who were sitting in judgment upon their own conduct. It was impossible that such a Committee could arrive at any useful conclusion. He had ventured to say that it would prove a broad farce, and would do nothing. Well, that Committee sat throughout the Session and did nothing. When the House met in the following year, the gallant Officer who had moved for the Committee was so convinced of the utter absurdity of such a Committee that he declined to move for its re-appointment. He (Mr. Bentinck) sincerely hoped that no hon. Member would ever move for its re-appointment. He should, however, like to see a Committee of men appointed who would be competent to deal with the subject—not men who would be compelled by circumstances to prejudge the question. He contended that no officials or ex-officials were competent to sit as members of such a Committee. Until the House was willing and determined to appoint a Committee fairly constituted, and resolved to investigate the subject thoroughly, it was utterly useless to propose any modifications of the system under which the Board of Admiralty acted; and whilst the present system continued, the annual discussions that took place in that House on the subject of economy in the public expenditure would be entirely and utterly fruitless.

THE IONIAN ISLANDS.—QUESTION.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH asked the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty, Whether he had any objection to place upon the table of the House the Correspondence that took place in the years from 1808 to 1813, inclusive, between the Admiralty and the naval commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean, respecting the advisability of having a harbour in the Adriatic for the use of the British fleet? He was desirous that the Correspondence should be produced, as he believed it would be of material value in a discussion that must take place shortly respecting the cession of the Protectorate of the Ionian Islands. When Napoleon obtained possession of Corfu in consequence of a secret article of the Treaty of Tilsit, he was so impressed with the importance of the Island that he despatched one of his best officers to hold it. There was not only a long Correspondence between the Home Government and the military commander of the British Forces in Sicily, but also between Lord Collingwood and the Admiralty, and in the latter Correspondence he thought they would find the opinion of Nelson as to the necessity for our possessing a port in the Adriatic for the use of our navy. Sir Charles Rowley in 1811, when in command of a squadron in the Adriatic, made a report, in which he stated his opinion, that if we did not obtain possession of Corfu, it was of importance that we should have the Island of Lissa, which would require but a small garrison, while Corfu required a large one. He hoped that the question of the surrender of the Ionian Islands would be well considered, as it was of great importance upon naval and military grounds. It was true there was a great difference of opinion among officers upon the question, many believing, that as we retained Malta, we did not need Corfu, and he himself was disposed to entertain that view. He should be glad to see the garrison of Corfu withdrawn, and one portion of it sent to Malta and another to Gibraltar. Still he thought it would be proper to retain some island like Lissa, where a small garrison would suffice, and to which vessels could run for repairs and for water without having to proceed to Malta. He hoped there would be no objection to the production of the Correspondence.

VICE CONSUL AT ABBEOKUTA.

QUESTION.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR called attention to the fact that a British Vice Consul was commissioned last year for Abbeokuta, in Western Africa; that on his arrival, and presenting his credentials to the native authorities, he was peremptorily refused permission to remain in that capacity, and was compelled to return to England; and asked the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, whether he could explain the cause of this rejection of a British representative, and whether any steps had been taken by the Foreign Office in consequence? Abbeokuta was about eighty miles from Lagos, and was a place of considerable consequence in relation to the slave trade. Last year a Mr. Taylor had been appointed Vice Consul there. On his arrival he caused a communication to be made to the King of Abbeokuta announcing his arrival and his office. The King, in the presence of his chiefs, ultimately gave him an audience. Mr. Taylor was first asked whether he was a merchant, and then whether he was a missionary. Having replied in the negative, to both of these queries, he proceeded to explain the objects of his presence in that place—namely, to facilitate friendly relations with the King, and to encourage the commerce of the country. The King then informed him that he could not receive him in the capacity of consul. Mr. Taylor, having returned to his residence, received an intimation, that unless he quitted the place before night, the roof of his house would be burnt over his head. He thereupon immediately returned to England. Now, several reasons were alleged for this conduct on the part of the African King. One was that he was incensed at the conduct pursued by certain British officials in respect to his mode of dealing with his chiefs. It was stated that two of his wives had escaped from his court, and taken refuge at Lagos. The ladies being pursued by some of his chiefs, they were arrested at Lagos, brought up prisoners before the court there, and were sentenced by the authorities of Lagos to three months' confinement and hard labour. Remonstrances against this treatment, it was alleged, were made; but without success. This was said to be one cause for the irritation of the King towards this country. It was also said that the King was indignant at our sending a consul into his dominions without any previous intimation on our part that we were about to take such a step. The position of Abbeokuta, in the centre of a great cotton district, made it a matter of the greatest importance to us to have a representative stationed there. The place had a wall around it eighteen miles in extent, and contained a population of 150,000. The

hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by putting the Question.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in answer to the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham (Sir F. Smith), said, that there was no objection to produce any correspondence which the Admiralty might possess on the utility of the Ionian Islands. He had been unable to find anything of interest on that subject; but if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would himself call at the Admiralty, he could look at the papers; or if he would give him the dates, search should be made for them.

His hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay) asked why the recommendations of the Transport Committee had not been carried out? The transport service of the Admiralty was admirably organized, and they would willingly undertake the transport both of the Indian and Colonial Departments. But the Indian Department objected, and the Colonial Office also gave reasons (which were laid on the table of the House last year) against the emigration branch coming under the Admiralty. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had re-opened the question of the composition of the Admiralty. He did not think that was a matter which could be advantageously discussed on the present occasion. The hon. Member complained that the members of the Board were constantly changing. Well, the present members of the Board did not desire any changes. They were perfectly willing to remain at their posts, so that he quite agreed with the hon. Member on this point. He also alluded to the reductions made in the navy this year, which he said resembled the reductions in 1835. [MR. BENTINCK: No.] If the hon. Member would allow him to make his statement in Committee on the Naval Estimates he should, he hoped, succeed in convincing him and the House that the Estimates, had been reduced without any injury to the efficiency of the navy. The hon. Member said the Government proposed very large Estimates one year, and that then, if a cry for economy arose, they suddenly reduced them below the proper point. The course of the Government, however, had been very fair and uniform. The year 1860-1 was a year of reconstruction, and saw the Navy Estimates at their climax—£12,836,100. Next year they were reduced to £12,640,588. In 1862-3 they were again reduced to £11,794,305; and now the Government proposed to reduce them to £10,736,000. These successive reductions had been gradual, and had been attained without injury to the navy. The hon. Member had also alluded to the French transport service. The Admiralty were, of course, aware that the French were building very magnificent transport ships, for cavalry as well as infantry. But the hon. Member for West Norfolk talked as if the Admiralty could stop the building of these vessels. They had no power to interfere. The French Government thought it necessary to possess these transport ships, and it was only just to remember that they had not the facilities which the Government of this country possessed in our mercantile marine. The French had a large colony in Algiers, and they required, from time to time, to transport large bodies of troops to that country. Then the hon. Member told the House to look at the French dockyards, and charged the Admiralty with reducing the strength of the dockyards to 10,000 or 13,000 men. The fact was, the Admiralty were employing 16,600 men in the dockyards and factories. They were also having large works executed by contract; so that they employed altogether more men than the hon. Gentleman supposed. He would, however, reserve his full explanation for his official statement.

Mr. LAYARD, in answer to the hon. Member for Southampton (Mr. D. Seymour), said, he could not pretend to say what were the true motives which had actuated the King of Abbeokuta in declining the presence of a British Vice Consul. The motives alleged were first, that we had not given him the assistance which we ought to have done in his war with the King of Dahomey; and, secondly, that Mr. Taylor's arrival had not been announced in a proper manner. In point of fact, however, the head men of the tribe had requested Mr. Taylor to be sent, and it was therefore foolish to say that the Abbeokutans had not received due intimation of his arrival. He (Mr. Layard), however, believed that the true reason that had influenced the King in his conduct to Mr. Taylor was, that he had not been behaving well of late, and we had been obliged to give him a little good advice. The Abbeokutans had been carrying on a very unnecessary war with a friendly tribe, and had mixed themselves up with the slave trade, and had also plundered a considerable amount of property belonging to Dr.

Lord Clarence Paget

Bakie, who was stationed on the Niger. The chiefs were very angry with us for remonstrating with them on these subjects and demanding reparation; they declared they would not have any Englishman living amongst them except in the capacity of a merchant or of a missionary; they had those two classes of persons established in the country, and they did not want a third. They had treated Mr. Taylor in a very unbecoming manner; but the Government had no fault whatever to find with that gentleman. The Government had informed the Abbeokutans that they must apologize for their treatment of Mr. Taylor, and make reparation not only for the pillage to which he had already referred, but for the robbery and murder of certain British and Lagos traders committed since Mr. Taylor's expulsion. With respect to the two wives, he feared he had no satisfactory answer to give the hon. and learned Member. He had better apply to the Colonial Office.

Mr. KINNAIRD said, he had made inquiries as to any wish or attempt on the part of the missionaries to interfere, and found it quite a mistake. He was convinced it could be shown that Mr. Townsend was not unwilling, but was anxious, that a Consul should be appointed, and he had hoped to hear that the Government had made arrangements to secure the presence of a Consul in that place.

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS wished to draw attention to the great increase of flogging which had taken place in the navy during the last year. He found that the number of men flogged was 1,076, and the number of lashes was 36,463. Last Session a great deal was said about the impropriety of allowing seamen to be flogged without sentence of a court martial, but he regretted to find the rule had not been adopted. In the previous year the number of men flogged was only 764, and the number of lashes to which they were sentenced was only 26,000 odd. In 1852 there were only 575 men flogged, and the number of lashes was 17,500 odd. He hoped the attention of the Government would be drawn to the increase that had taken place in this degrading punishment.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.

Supply considered in Committee.

THE NAVY ESTIMATES.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, if I were to state to the Committee, that I was in a position to propose to them a considerable reduction of the Navy Estimates, without being able at the same time to show them that the reduction would be carried into effect without interfering with the efficiency of the service, I do not think I should be making a statement which would furnish a subject for congratulation to the House or to the country. If, however, I can show you, that owing to the great generosity of Parliament, we have been enabled to make enormous exertions during the last few years, and to place the navy, both as regards personnel and material, on a satisfactory footing, then I may, I trust, be allowed to possess a fair claim to congratulate the Committee on the prospect of our maintaining it in that position, while we effect a great reduction in our outlay for the purpose. That the navy was never in a more efficient state than at the present moment, both so far as the seamen are concerned and so far as relates to our progress in the construction of that class of ships which has lately come into vogue, I can, I think, notwithstanding the suspicions of my hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), without difficulty prove. I may add that during the debates which may take place on the subject I shall, if possible, refrain from alluding to other Powers at all, for I have found that comparisons between our naval resources and those of foreign nations produce somewhat of ill-feeling. I therefore deem it desirable that we should confine ourselves as much as possible to our own affairs.

Now, Sir, the total Vote which I have to propose to the Committee for the naval service for the year 1863-4 amounts to £10,736,032, the Estimate for 1862-3 having been £11,794,305, showing a decrease of £1,058,273 in the Estimate for the present as compared with that for the last year. This decrease will be found to pervade the whole of the Estimates with a few exceptions, the only real increase which occurs under any head this year being in the Vote for the transport service—a Vote over which, as the Committee are aware, the Admiralty has no control, inasmuch as the instructions on which it depends emanate from the War

Office, and we are bound to carry them into effect. The cause of the increase in the present instance is mainly due to the removal of troops in large numbers to distant stations. There are, for instance, two regiments to be sent to New Zealand and others to be brought back, the cost of which proceedings is no less than £61,576, exclusive of the cost of the sustenance of the men. This will give the Committee an idea of the expense of removing men to our distant stations. In most of the other Votes there is a decrease. In Vote No. 1—that which has reference to the Wages of the Seamen—there is an apparent decrease, but not a real one. I have seen it, indeed, stated in some of the public journals that we were about to reduce the pay of the sailor; but that is not the fact. We propose the same Vote for seamen as before, but I have taken certain liberties in framing these Estimates, which I shall now explain. The effect of the change which I have made will, I think, be found to be advantageous, and I will briefly state in what it consists. First of all, there is connected with each Vote an explanatory statement, which is a mere matter of account, and which I have removed to an Appendix at the end of the Estimates. From Vote No. 1, also, I have transferred certain items which appertain to the Victualling Vote (No. 2), and which relate mainly to bedding, clothes, and a variety of matters of that nature, which, in my opinion, ought years ago to have been so transferred. If, therefore, the Committee will follow me, they will see that so far from there being any decrease in Vote No. 1 it is in reality the same, and that we simply transfer a certain sum to Vote No. 2. Taking the two Votes together, however—that for the victualling and the pay—you will observe that there is on the two a decrease of £101,277. This decrease is due principally to the fact that almost every article supplied to the seamen in the shape of provisions is much cheaper at the present time than was formerly the case. There is, indeed, one article—vinegar—which is rather dearer than formerly; but as it is not much drunk in the navy, its increased cost is not a matter of very much importance; while, the price of all the other articles having been reduced, we have been enabled to effect a considerable reduction under this head. The next Vote on which there is any important decrease is that for Artificers; and if my hon.

Friend the Member for Norfolk would have the goodness to attend to me for a moment, he would, I have no doubt, be disposed to lament the cause of reduction as much as I do. It is due to the great decrease in the manufacture of sails—can-vas, to the regret of all lovers of sailing, has given way to coals. In Vote No. 10, for Naval Stores, there is a decrease of £410,133, of which the greater part is for timber; and I may state that this reduction has not been forced upon us by any pressure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but arises from the circumstance that we have at last got a stock of timber worthy of the country, there being no less than 112,000 loads of old timber on our hands at this moment—a position which I do not believe we were ever in before. In the Controller's Department we ask for a less sum this year by £300,380 for steam machinery; because the engines already ordered are in a very advanced state, and there is at present no very pressing demand for steam-engines. Upon "Ships building by Contract," we ask for a considerably less sum than last year; and, moreover, we do not propose any new construction of iron ships in the coming year; but at a later period I will explain what we are doing in that respect. The next Vote upon which there is a decrease is upon Vote 11, for New Works. I see the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) in his place, and I confess I expect some complaint from him with regard to what I am now about to mention. The fact is, that in deference to the opinion of this House, the Admiralty have seriously thought whether they ought or ought not to construct a large basin at Portsmouth. It would undoubtedly cost a very large sum of money; and before I or whoever may occupy my position asks a Vote for this purpose, it would be requisite to lay before the House full and detailed plans, showing the whole cost of the works. We had intended to propose it this year, and to insert the sum in this year's Estimates. I must take upon myself some part of the blame—though it must be shared by the Law Officers of the Admiralty—that it is not inserted; but the fact is, we found at the eleventh hour that it was necessary to pass a private Act of Parliament in order to enable us to commence the works, though I had supposed that as the property belonged to the Admiralty, we might at once have proposed a sum to the House; but when we discovered our mistake, it was too late to comply with the Standing Orders, and therefore the amount we intended to ask was erased from the Estimates. But, Sir, we proceed vigorously at Chatham. The noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) will, I hope, now give me credit for great anxiety in pushing forward the works at Chatham, and accordingly we shall do as much work there during the next year as we possibly can. We therefore propose to take for the works at Chatham as large a sum as we can expend. We likewise propose to take a considerable sum for the new long dock at Malta, in addition to the dock-yard. The Maltese authorities have been in communication with the Imperial Government, and they have proposed to contribute a portion of the expenses for the works which we intend to construct at the head of the great harbour. I will be ready by-and-by to give further explanations on this subject. But, Sir, there is a public work which the Admiralty has not ceased to desire, inasmuch as it is one which will be absolutely necessary at some future time. If, in the event of war, you mean to have your naval business conducted with vigour and despatch, it will be necessary to have the Admiralty offices amalgamated and brought under one roof. That matter has been under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. We volunteered to go to Somerset House; but we found that the alterations necessary would cost a great deal, and there were other important reasons to be urged against such a step; and I am sorry to say we do not as yet ask for any sum for that purpose, important as the measure is. Now, Sir, having given a general sketch of the principal items of decrease in the Naval Estimates for the coming year, the Committee will permit me to give some account of the numerous details of various branches. And, first of all, with regard to the construction of ships. Sir, I have laid upon the table of the House the usual annual Return of the number of steamships afloat and building; and as the Return is rather a long one, I will not, unless it be desired, go through its details, but will shortly state we have now under construction and at sea, twenty-one armour-plated vessels. I will endeavour to show how soon the ships under construction will be ready for sea, and the progress we intend to make in the further construction of iron-cased ships. The House is aware that we have at this moment at sea the Warrior, the Black Prince, the Defence, and the Resistance. They have been tried under various circumstances, and I am happy to assure the Committee that the reports concerning them are very satisfactory. They are all good sea-boats. One of them, which I remember, was very much criticised last year—the smaller one—the Resistance, has proved herself the fastest of the whole under canvas. Now, smaller ships have various advantages over larger ones; and in saying this I do not mean to detract from the merits of the Warrior, the child of my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Pakington). I believe the hon. Member for Tyne-mouth (Mr. Lindsay) has seen the Warrior at Lisbon, and can give a very good account of her. [Mr. LINDSAY: Hear, Hear!]

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON:—What is the speed of the Resistance?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET:—Her speed under steam is $11\frac{1}{2}$ knots an hour; but the trials that have been made have been principally with a view to try their going in a circle their action with respect to pitching and rolling, and their general sailing qualities. Those ships have just returned from their cruise to Lisbon. The Royal Oak will probably be ready for sea in May, and the Prince Consort in June. Both these vessels are wooden line-of-battle ships converted into armour-plated, and about 4,000 tons. The Hector, an iron ship of intermediate size between the Warrior and the Resistance class, will be ready for sea in July. I do not say that all these ships will be commissioned as soon as they are completed; my object is to show when they will be ready. The Caledonia, another of the wooden line-of-battle ship converted, will be ready in September. And now we come to a novel class of ship concerning which it is desirable that I should say a few words. The House will remember that for some time it was supposed that no ship would be able to carry armour-plates so as to attain high speed unless one of a very large tonnage. It was, however, undoubtedly most desirable that we should have vessels of somewhat less tonnage, and less costly, but still able to bear armour-plates. Mr. Reed, now about to be Chief Constructor of the Navy, was employed by the Admiralty to carry out the construction of ships of this class, and he was ordered to build three—the Enter- prise, the Research, and the Favourite. The Enterprise is to have a wooden bottom—that is to enable her to go to distant stations, but she will carry very heavy guns and will be entirely armour-plated in the middle and along her water-line. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: Is she in armour?] The armour is entire in the middle, and along the water-line—but the extremities are of plate-iron and an iron-skin. She is also to be sheathed with Muntz-metal. These three ships are very much of the same nature. The Enterprise will be ready by October, the Research in February, 1864, and the Favourite in June, 1864. The Enterprise is a vessel of 990 tons, and the other two, the Research and the Favourite, are respectively of 1,253 and 2,186 tons. The Royal Sovereign, turret ship, converted from a three-decker, will be ready in November. The statement with regard to the preparation of ships must always be a matter of uncertainty. We have some admirable constructors of armour-plates all over the country; but questions of difficulty are apt to arise, and it is better that we should delay our ships than that we should go on and plate them with insufficient armour. While upon armour-plates let me pay honour where honour is due. We can get good plates, both hammered and rolled, but we find that the rolled are more uniform, and Mr. Brown, a gentleman distinguished by great zeal, and conducting important works at Sheffield, has been most successful in producing plates. I may likewise mention that Mr. Beale, of Parkgate, has been successful, and I hope will be yet more so. These are makers of rolled plates, which, on the whole, have been more successful than the other kind. I am likewise bound to give the Thames Iron Company credit for hammered plates; but lately, as I have mentioned, the hammered plates have been considered less successful. Another point of interest is the annealing, or gradually cooling, process. We tried annealing, and in some cases were successful and in others we failed. We actually took the same plate, and cutting it in two, annealed one-half, leaving the other half unannealed; but the effect in respect to both was very much the same, so completely are we in a state of uncertainty as to the result of different processes. We are, however, in good hopes that we shall succeed in having a regular supply of plates without any defect. I have already stated that by the end of the year we shall have altogether, including the ships at sea as well as those under construction, nine large armour-plated ships and one smaller one ready for sea. In the spring of next year we shall have a great development again. We shall then have the Ocean, one of the wooden line-of-battle ships, armour-plated; the Valiant, sister to the Hector, an intermediate class between the Warrior and Resistance, built wholly of iron; the Prince Albert, of iron, the second ship on the turret principle, in which Captain Coles is to mount six guns; and the Achilles, building at Chatham. We hope they will be afloat and sea-ready almost by April in next year, and also the Achilles, sister to the Warrior, and the Royal Alfred, and the Zealous, wooden ships like the Royal Oak. Then, as to small ships, we shall have two—the Favourite and the Research, to which I have already alluded—making in all eighteen armour-plated ships ready for sea by April in next year. Under these circumstances I hope the hon. Member for Norfolk will admit that we are making progress in preparing ships for launching. Then come the three leviathan ships of upwards of 6,600 tons each—namely, the Agincourt, the Minotaur, and the Northumberland. When these ships will be ready I cannot pretend to say, as that matter depends on the contractors. I believe that they are making great exertions to get the vessels ready, but, of course, it is not in my power to state when they will be finished. I will now state what we propose to do with respect to further construction of the armour-plated fleet. We propose to prepare frames for five more large wooden armour-plated frigates. Having now a large stock of timber, it is really a matter of economy that we should construct these vessels in our own dockyards. This leads to the great question of wood versus iron. Undoubtedly, when we come to ships of very large tonnage, iron has the advantage over wood. Wooden vessels are subject to great vibration when put to high speed, and time damages them and causes them to decay. Wooden vessels cannot be said to be lasting; but the Committee should remember that ours, after all, are not worse than other nations', and they are building wooden ships; and therefore it is advisable, that having a good stock of timber on hand, we should construct a certain number more of these ships. Hon. Gentlemen—mercantile gentlemen—will, I know, say, build them of iron; but these hon. Gentlemen should remember, that until some one will devise the means of keeping their bottoms clean, they are not so useful as wooden ships, as long as the latter last. The Controller of the Navy will tell you, that if you are to have iron ships, you ought almost to have one dock for every ship. We are covering our iron ships' bottoms with paint and composition of every description, and there is actually a trial being made to enamel them. We are endeavouring to get over the difficulty arising from the fouling of the bottoms in every possible way, feeling that as long as that mischief exists, we must think that for many purposes wooden vessels are superior to iron. As an argument in favour of iron vessels, I may say that Admiral Robinson, the Controller of the Navy, has gone very carefully into the average cost to the country of maintaining a wooden fleet, and he has come to the conclusion that for every man that you vote for your navy you must put down £10 for the mere wages of artificers to keep the ships in repair. Thus, supposing you have 76,000 men, the wages of artificers for keeping the ships in repair would amount to £760,000 a year. I do not mean to say whether this calculation is right or wrong, but hon. Gentlemen have the power to judge of these matters for themselves, because there is annually laid on the table of the House a detail of the cost of every ship in the navy. I still avoid stating exactly what is to be the armament of any ship, because I do not think any one could give a proper opinion as to what will be the armament. Great experiments are going on. Mr. Whitworth says that he can make a gun capable of sending a projectile through anything; while others assert that he cannot. But we have this consolation in regard to all the ships we are building, that they can carry thicker plates, if necessary. Before I quit this subject of ships, I wish to say, speaking entirely on my own responsibility, that I believe an invention is coming out which, if successful, will produce a great reform in the masting of vessels. Captain Coles, who is well known as a very clever and ingenious officer, has invented a system of masting which will altogether do away with rigging. This system consists in having an iron cylinder for the mast, supported by two other cylinders, which in fact represent the rigging. If this invention succeeds, it will get rid of the difficulty of falling rigging fouling the screw. This has not been tried yet. I think I have now made the Committee acquainted, as well as I am able, with the progress of our ship-building operations. There are a certain number of small ships likewise building which are really not of surpassing interest at the present day in comparison with the armour-plated ships.

Having dealt with this part of the subject—the outside skin as I may call it—I now come to the pith and marrow and bone of the navy—namely, the seamen. We take this year a Vote for the same number of officers, seamen, marines, and boys as we took last year—namely, 76,000. There is, in fact, a small increase, because the civilians—a class of men in the coast guard service of the Custom-house, left as a legacy by the Custom-house to the Admiralty—are fast disappearing, and as they disappear their places are supplied by seamen in the coast guard. Their number was last year 1,150. This year it is only 1,000; so that there is really this small increase of 150 seamen. The men are distributed as follows:—I should, perhaps, weary the House if I told them what are the ships at every station. I will, therefore, content myself with giving the numbers in the Channel fleet and on the Mediterranean, North American, and Indian stations. In the Channel we have one ship of the line, the Revenge, four of these iron-plated frigates, and one other vessel—that is, six ships. They carry 187 guns and are manned by 3,146 men. In the Mediterranean we have 6 ships of the line, 5 frigates and corvettes, and 15 other vessels. These 26 ships carry 706 guns, and are manned by 8,524 men. On the North American and West Indian station we have 1 ship of the line, 8 frigates and corvettes, and 22 other vessels. These 31 ships carry 543 guns and are manned by 6,573 men. On the East India and China stations, where we have charged ourselves with the extra duties of the Indian navy, which existed up to last year, and which, therefore, has necessitated an increase, we have 4 frigates and corvettes, and 29 other vessels. These 33 ships carry 234 guns, and are manned by 3,528 men. On distant stations we have 14 frigates and corvettes, and 40 other vessels. These 54 ships carry 587 guns, and are manned by 8,566

men. The result of the whole is, that we have 150 ships in commission, carrying 2,257 guns and manned by 30,337 men. In addition we have various services, ships ordered home and on surveying service, taking 14,648 men. We have reserves of seamen, and I know my right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) attaches great interest to the number of reserves in home ports. Within the last few weeks we have told off a line-of-battle ship's crew for the Royal Oak, and they are ready to go on board as soon as they are wanted. The present number of reserves is 3,000. The supernumerary warrant officers, kroomen, &c., number 4,000. We have boys under training, independent of those in the fleet, to the number of 2,050. We have 11,000 marines on shore. The coast guard afloat, including tenders and blockships, number 4,652, and the coast guard ashore 4,000. The grand total is 73,687 men on the 23rd of February, irrespective of civilians, showing that we are some few hundred short of our Vote, principally marines and boys, and, of course, we are taking steps to complete the full number. Such, then, is the state of the personnel, and I may give the Committee the assurance that nothing can be more satisfactory or more contented than the condition of the seamen of the fleet. We have not yet got rid of the bounty men—that class who fill up the Return from which the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) has just quoted; but so important does the Admiralty think it, that in order to clear them off as soon as possible, they have brought home several ships and paid them off, with the view of getting rid of those men. The Return is for 1861—Every Gentleman must be sorry that it should be necessary to resort to flogging. Discipline requires that we should have the power, but it is our earnest desire to keep down the punishment as much as possible, and I hope next year the Return may be more satisfactory. The popularity of the service may be seen from this fact:—My right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) will recollect that at the commencement of the continuous-service system there was considerable difficulty in inducing the men to enter for continuous service. Our present position is that more than three-fourths are continuous service men: this gives us great facility in manning the ships; because the men who have come home, after a tour of leave join fresh ships.

There is yet another test of the improvement of the fleet. The Committee will remember that three years ago it was determined to put the men in two classes, and that men in the first class should not be liable to flogging. Of the whole number 87 per cent of the men in the fleet belong to the first class by their own good conduct, leaving only 13 per cent in the second class. The Admiralty have used great endeavours to organize barracks for seamen. We are going to commence barracks at Portsmouth, if the Committee will agree to the Vote I am about to propose. We have not progressed so rapidly at Plymouth as might be wished, because we found that the site was not central enough. We have transferred that site to the War Office, who have given us a site near the north end of the dockyard, with which, in consequence of the changes in the fortifications, they are able to dispense. We propose to begin at Devonport and also to lay the foundations of barracks at Portsmouth. Before I quit the subject of punishment, let me advert to the boys. The system is developing itself with great success, and we principally owe the good conduct of the men to the ships having been manned by those who were our own boys. Sir Frederick Grey has bestowed much care and attention on this subject, and he assures me, that to the best of his belief, in the course of a short time our navy may be filled up entirely by our own boys, with the exception of 600 or 700 men, who will be required to be introduced from other sources. The reason we have been able to reduce punishment is because you have generously given us the means by which these changes have been made. You have expended large sums in the education of these boys, and you are now beginning to reap the reward of your great expenditure for the benefit of the navy. There are other subjects connected with the fleet to which I will allude. We are trying various methods of ventilation, and we believe that when the ships are properly ventilated there will be a decrease in the sick lists. Lastly comes the question of cooking. I last year mentioned that there was a desire to introduce the system of baking soft bread. Strange to say, we found that it was rather objected to, and the men preferred biscuit. But we attribute it not to any dislike of soft bread, but because they can get their savings of biscuit, which they cannot of bread. We are trying a new cooking apparatus, by which we hope to be able to give not only soft bread, but roast meat as a change for the meat which is now habitually boiled. I now turn to the subject of the Naval Reserve. That great body of merchant seamen, which has now become a national institution, has largely increased in number during the last year. The House may remember that that year the number enrolled was 10,000. We have now nearly 15,000 drilled and perfectly ready to serve their country. Of these 7,000 are at home and can be called out at any moment. It is impossible for me to speak too highly of this valuable force. We have also established a body of officers of the Naval Reserve. Of the 400 officers which Parliament empowered us to engage we have already 91, which in a single year is a considerable number to obtain. Then we have the Naval Coast Volunteers, a very fine body of men, whom we think we may still improve. At present we have no power to take these men beyond one hundred leagues from their own shores. It appears to us very desirable, that in the event of our requiring the services of this force, we should not be confined to employing them within so limited a distance. We believe that by a little more care in the selection of recruits we may be able to induce seafaring men to join the force on the understanding that a more extended use is to be made of their services should necessity require them. Accordingly, it will be my duty to introduce a Bill for the purpose of reorganizing that force. A body of pensioners and riggers completes the sum of our naval forces.

I have now, Sir, I think, shown to the Committee, that while the Government have endeavoured to enforce a strict economy, they have done so without making any reduction in the number of our forces. I sincerely hope that whatever the Committee may do, they will at least not compel the Government to curtail the number of this magnificent body of men. There are several minor items with which I need not now trouble the Committee, but about which hon. Members may perhaps desire information when we come to the particular Votes. For instance there is a small increase, which I have no doubt will be cheerfully conceded, in the pay of colonels of marines. We also propose to reorganize the establishment of clerks in the dockyards. At present each dockyard has its own special staff, but we desire to mass them together, so that we may be able to command the services of each clerk at any station we choose. In that way we hope to secure both greater economy and efficiency. We are also desirous of making a small increase in the establishment of the Controller of the Navy, the business of which has quite outgrown the staff. I hope I have satisfied the Committee by what I have said that in reducing the expenditure the Government have not in any way sacrificed the interests of the navy. In consequence of the great sums which Parliament has granted to the Admiralty in past years, we have been enabled to make an important addition to the fleet, to furnish our dockyards with ample stores, and to reorganize our magnificent forces. Mr. Massey, I beg to move to resolve—

“That 76,000 Men and Boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services, for the Year ending the 31st day of March 1863, including 18,000 Marines.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON:—I have listened with much attention to the very able statement of my noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty, and I am happy to say that I have heard nothing in that statement to render it necessary for me to trouble the Committee with more than a few observations. I am still more happy to say that I find nothing in the Estimates, any more than in the speech of my noble Friend, which requires me to make serious objections to any portion of the proposals of the Government. A very strong and natural desire has prevailed, on the part both of Parliament and the country, that the enormous amount which the Navy Estimates had reached during the last few years should be reduced as far as was compatible with the interests of the service. It is therefore very satisfactory to learn that the Government have made the Estimates for this year less by a million than those of the year before. And I am bound to say, that I think my noble Friend is justified in claiming for the Government credit for effecting that reduction without encroaching on the efficiency of the navy. Those points to which the advocates of a strong navy attach most importance are the maintenance of an adequate number of men and progress in the building of that new class of vessels the value of which is every year becoming more apparent. I am afraid that those opinions are not shared by all the Gentlemen on both sides of the Committee; but I feel bound to express my own satisfaction that the Government has not proposed any reduction in the number of men. That has been a wise and prudent resolve. Irrespective of the extent of the force we are asked to vote, every one must have heard, with unqualified gratification, the statements of my noble Friend as to the improved character of the men. I listened with some anxiety to what my noble Friend had to say on the subject of flogging. There can be no doubt that there is a general desire that the discipline of the navy should be maintained without resort to that mode of punishment. I trust that the disuse of corporal punishment may be brought about by the improved character of the seamen, and that the Admiralty will take care not to make any changes calculated to impair the discipline of the service. I have had reason to observe that whatever the power of the navy may have been, its discipline was not quite what we could have desired; and therefore I had the more satisfaction in hearing what the noble Lord said, and I hope that the discipline of the navy will improve with its increased comforts. I also heard, with great satisfaction, of the great increase of continuous-service men. My noble Friend has adverted to the anxiety I have felt bound to express in former years that an end might be put to those discreditable scenes, of which we had recently seen too many, when ships lay in the roadsteads for weeks and months waiting for men to fill up their crews. I am glad to know that what I have so long urged is at length accomplished, and that we have now a Reserve of seamen, who may be draughted to any ship which requires a crew. I am only sorry that we have not had a more satisfactory statement as to the accommodation provided for the Reserve. I fear that the greater part of them are scattered about in hulks and elsewhere. My noble Friend himself acknowledges the importance of barracks, and I regret that the Government did not see fit to take a larger Vote for barracks this year. [LORD CLARENCE PAGET: That is because we can only go on with the foundations at first.] I trust, however, that no feeling of economy will induce the Government to delay the progress of the works. Looking to the importance of a permanent Reserve, I hope that no mere wish to cut down a Vote has led the Government to propose a smaller sum for this item, and that no time really will be lost in the completion of these barracks. Another important item to which I look is the progress of our ships; and here again I am happy to say that I regard the statement of the noble Lord as perfectly satisfactory. I was glad to hear from him that there are no less than twenty-one armour-covered vessels now in progress, and that by the end of the year ten will be launched and ready for commission. I feel some doubts with regard to the success of all the different classes of these ships; but, looking to the fact that this new class of men-of-war is yet in its infancy, and that we have not yet considered the best mode of constructing them, considerable latitude ought certainly to be left to the Government in trying those experiments without which we cannot hope to arrive at any successful result. I doubt very much whether the advantages possessed by that larger class of ships—the Minotaur, the Northumberland, and the Agincourt—which the present Admiralty are building, covered entirely with armour from one end to the other, and larger by 500 or 600 tons than the Warrior and the Black Prince, may not be purchased too dearly, and whether they will be really found to be good sea-going ships in heavy weather. The cupola ships must be regarded as a matter of experiment, and I am not disposed to blame the Admiralty for trying them. So with regard, too, to the new class of ships, of which no one I suppose has heard anything until to-night, which have been recommended by the new Constructor of the Navy, Mr. Reed. I cannot mention Mr. Reed's name without expressing my regret at the unusual course which the Admiralty have taken in placing a gentleman entirely unconnected with the Admiralty in such a high position over the heads of an establishment which, undoubtedly, contains within itself some persons of great ability and skill. I should be sorry to say a word which would do injustice to Mr. Reed, for it happens that he is secretary to the Institute of Naval Architects, of which I have the honour to be president. I have seen much of him during the last few years, and know more of him personally than of any of the dockyard officials. All the intercourse I have had with him has given me a high opinion of his character and his general abilities. Therefore I do not wish to speak with the slightest disrespect of him. But, on the other hand, looking at the proved ability and tried skill of Mr. Oliver Lang, who possesses the union of great constructive ability and high scientific acquirements, as has been proved by his designs for some of the finest ships in the navy, with all my respect for Mr. Reed, I cannot but feel some regret at the unusual course of placing him over the heads of gentlemen who possess skill and ability equal to his own. Looking at the other parts of the Estimates, I now come to the extension of the dockyard at Chatham. I beg to say that I entirely approve of what the Admiralty are doing at Chatham; whether I approve of what my noble Friend has been saying at Chatham is quite another thing. He may have said a good deal—perhaps more than was quite discreet—but I am now adverting to what he has been doing, and not to what he has been saying; and I should not be doing my duty if I did not express my approval of what appears to be the desire of the Government to make that a more important arsenal. I myself, when in office, always expressed my intention of proposing a considerable sum of money in making Chatham our chief naval arsenal. I am sorry, however, not to see a larger sum than £20,000 down in the Estimates for this purpose for the current year, and I hope my noble Friend will be able to say that the Government mean to press forward the works at Chatham Dockyard as fast as possible. The only other point to which I wish to refer was touched upon in the last part of my noble Friend's speech—I mean the improved ventilation of our men of war. Last year I think the noble Lord said, a Committee had been appointed by the Admiralty to consider what was the best mode of improving the ventilation in our ships of war. I am afraid I must infer from what the noble Lord said, either that the Committee has not reported, or that they have reported in such a manner as not to enable the Admiralty to act in the matter. This is a very pressing matter. I received a communication lately describing the dreadful sufferings of the men on board a ship of war on the West India station from yellow fever during the year 1861, and a great part of these is to be attributed to defective ventilation. The crews of the Firebrand, the Spiteful, the Jason, and the Racer, were attacked with yellow fever in 1861, and my information is that no less than 334 cases, or one-half of the whole of the crews, were attacked by this malady. I am sorry, therefore, that some more satisfactory mode of ventilating our ships has not been devised. In closing these observations I can only express my satisfaction in being enabled to address myself in such a tone to the statements and remarks of my noble Friend.

MR. BAXTER regretted to have heard from the hon. Member for Norfolk another homily on the danger of invasion from France. Hon. Members on the other side were always warning the country against danger from that quarter, and the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham (Sir F. Smith) to-night had argued that our fleet ought to be large enough to cope not only with France, but with the combined navies of France, Russia, Austria, and Turkey. All these ideas sprang from a foolish panic, which our Statesmen had rather encouraged than checked, and which had been continued under the delusive belief that our neighbours were acquiring a vast maritime superiority over us. He did not share in any such apprehensions, though he would not be backward to maintain the necessary defences of the country. No doubt, we ought always to have a force larger than that of any other Power, but, at the same time, it was wise policy to husband our resources in time of peace, so that they might be the more readily and easily expanded when danger really threatened our shores. He therefore objected to an establishment of 76,000 men in time of peace, believing that such an establishment was rather suited to a time of war; but he did not intend to move any reduction in the number of men, for this reason—that a careful examination of the Estimates had convinced him that the Government were, to a certain extent, in earnest in their desire to bring about a real and substantial saving. He hoped, however, that the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), and those who agreed with him, would not consider their work of last year finished. It had often been said out of doors that a large reduction in stores meant a large increase in the following year, and that the Government could raise or lower the Estimate according to the pressure placed upon them; and that we had consequently no security against an increase of the Estimates to their old figure next year. That was true; but those who advocated retrenchment should bear in mind that for several years past, they had been finding fault with the large sums asked for stores, that the Government had reduced them, and that until the Government gave them some reason to doubt their sincerity they had no right to do so. From a recent Return he found that the Government had suspended the building of no fewer than twenty-nine ships, which he regarded as a step in the right direction; and he was also glad to find that the Government were not building any large number of one particular class of vessels. In this age of invention, when new models succeeded one another with such rapidity, it was prudent not to rush into great expenditure on ships of any particular class, but rather to keep pace with the time, building one or two vessels upon each of the plans recommended by scientific men, and thus avoiding the serious blunder which so many successive Boards of Admiralty had committed—the blunder of getting together a large number of vessels of a class which soon became altogether unserviceable. We had fifty-six wooden screw line-of-battle ships, of which the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) ordered too many; and although he did good service when he ordered the Warrior, still it would be injudicious to build fifteen or twenty of that class. If in any respect our navy was defective, it was in the lighter and less expensive class of frigates—vessels of about 1,500 tons, like the Alabama, the speed of which would be a greater advantage than the enormous armaments of our heavier and most costly ships. The exploits of such flimsy boats as the Nashville and the Sumter might convince us that of late years we had attached too little importance to celerity of movement. He was sorry to observe that only a very paltry reduction was to be made in the wages of the home establishments, and he wanted to know whether the Government really intended to keep up the expenditure in our dockyards at the same high figure as before. As a financial reformer he was glad to see the increase which had taken place in the Naval Reserves, because he believed that no money could be better spent than the £130,000 which was voted for that department of the service. There could be no doubt that upon the Naval Reserves we must depend in the end for the security of the empire. He hoped, in conclusion, that the Government would continue in future years the policy of retrenchment which they had begun.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he was glad indeed that the country had experienced the panic which had been alluded to, because, if it had not been for the panic, we should not have been in our present state of preparation. He would support the noble Lord in asking for 76,000 men, because we must remember that we had now to provide for the naval service of the whole of India, and he should be very much mistaken if the Government did not find the demand both for men and money such as to make us regret that we had not retained the Indian navy on its old footing. It was satisfactory to find that the Government had at last resolved to take the transport service into their own hands, instead of going into the market and chartering ships at enormous prices whenever they wanted to convey troops from one place to another. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: The Government are still chartering ships.] He was sorry to hear it, because he was entirely at variance with the Government as to the expediency of chartering ships. He had often recommended that the number of transports should be increased; and he held in his hand a remarkable document bearing on the question. A copy of it had been sent to the Admiralty, and he trusted that it would soon be laid on the table of the House. It was the balance-sheet of the Himalaya during the four years she was in commission; her performances were recorded; her repairs and all other expenses were charged against her in a proper business-like manner; the statement was compared with the most favourable specimen of the ships chartered from private persons, and the result was greatly in favour of the Himalaya. The best thing the Government could do, would be to build six Himalayas on the model of that ship, which had proved to be a most extraordinary transport. One vessel was undergoing alteration in order to be converted into a transport, and he would be glad to hear something about her. With respect to the iron ships that were being built, he could not help thinking that we had commenced building too many classes before we understood what was the right thing. We ought to wait for the results of experiments not yet completed. It appeared that the ships that were at sea answered admirably in many respects; but anybody who understood the theory of stowage must know that the iron-plating placed in the upper part of a ship counteracting the heavy weights plunged into the hold, the coal-age and machinery, must in a great measure render a ship easier in her motion. But what he could not understand was the rigging of our vessels. Perhaps the noble Lord would inform them who was the inventor of it. The equilibrium of the Warrior was destroyed by placing great weights at her extremities, whereas she ought to be rigged with four masts, and the anchors ought to be brought further aft. Such vessels ought to be fitted upon the double screw principle, so as to facilitate their movement in an emergency; for a vessel on a lee shore that could not be turned round in less than twenty minutes was in a perilous position. It was stated that Mr. Reed, a gentleman who had acted as secretary to a debating society, had been appointed over the heads of such officers as Mr. Abethell, Mr. Oliver Lang, and Mr. Moody. In explanation of this appointment it was said that these meritorious officers were getting old. Why, Mr. Oliver Lang was not much older than the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, and Mr. Moody was in the prime of life. It would seem that Mr. Reed had been appointed in consequence of his possessing certain knowledge which every shipbuilder in any of the docks possessed in common with that gentleman; but he certainly could not be considered as an inventor of the highest class, for every one who understood the commonest principles of stowage must know the objections to iron ships with wooden bottoms. With regard to the docks at Portsmouth, he could not help thinking it was rather a lame excuse of his noble Friend that the forms of the House could not be complied with in time to introduce a Bill for their construction. Had the noble Lord got the plans of those docks ready? Were they in a state in which a Committee could judge of them? If so, what were the forms of the House that would prevent the noble Lord from bringing in a Bill at once, as was done in the case of the Chatham docks late last Session? He believed that the Chatham docks were necessary for the North Sea fleet; but as for the idea of Chatham ever being our principal arsenal, the thing was an absurdity. With regard to the barracks, were they designed in relation to the great scheme of a navy yard at Portsmouth; or were they begun at a hazard, as everything had been from time immemorial at Portsmouth? They ought to know whether the barracks were part of a great scheme, or whether their erection would involve loss in the future. The Committee which recommended the Reserve also recommended that naval schools should be established in all the outports. He could say with authority that these outports were desirous of having these schools, and their establishment would effect a great saving. The House would be surprised at the figures showing the difference between boys drafted into the navy from Sunderland, Shields, Greenock, Aberdeen, or Bristol, and those educated on board school ships. With regard to the Naval Reserve, it now only remained for the Government to be extremely cautious respecting the men they admitted into it. At first, no doubt, men were admitted who did not come up to the proper standard, and these men could not be got rid of. But now they were in a position safely to test the merits of every man before admission. He would certainly give the preference to men engaged in the coasting trade, because the more easily they could be laid hold of, the more effectual would the force always be. The ventilation of the ships had an important bearing on the health of the navy, and he could not help thinking that the ventilation of ships, and the proper construction of the smaller class of ships for tropical climates, had not been sufficiently attended to. The awning supplied to ships for the rivers of China and tropical climates was neither sufficient nor properly fitted to enable a crew to berth on deck. When he was in the Company's service, they had awnings of such a description that in the monsoons they were able to berth a certain portion of the men on the upper deck, and they enjoyed better health than those on board men-of-war. He saw a practical illustration of the extreme want of ventilation at Aberdeen last year. He went on board the man-of-war that was lying there. The temperature on the upper deck was 56 degrees. On the lower deck he found the thermometer at 72, close to where a man was lying in his hammock; and he was informed that at night, while the temperature on the upper deck was 50 degrees, it was 78 on the lower. With respect to corporal punishment, that varied with the character of the crew. He had known a ship's company whom it was believed nothing but the cat would keep in order, and he had known a crew among whom it was not necessary to take the cat out of the bag once in six months. The navy was now coming to the proper point with regard to punishment. As soon as summary dismissal from the service, with disgrace, was the recognised punishment for grave offences, the sooner would flogging be got rid of. He was glad to learn that corporal punishment was diminishing, and hoped it might one day expire altogether.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT congratulated his noble Friend upon the courtesy and ability with which he had submitted the Estimates to the Committee, but could not accord his unqualified satisfaction at the reduction proposed, and particularly the transfer of 1,000 seamen from immediate service afloat to the coast-guard.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET:—They are only put temporarily into the coast-guard ships, and might come back the next day.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: But meanwhile they lost their sea-legs. He could only express the hope that economy would not be purchased at too dear a price. We must never, for any consideration whatever, nor under any pressure, forget the all-important fact that our extensive commerce and remote and widely-scattered dependencies owed their safety wholly to the unimpaired condition and power of our navy. In the wars maintained by us within a century, all foreign Powers combined to dispute the sovereignty of the seas with our fleet, and he need not add without success. But at this hour, equally with that period, upon the superiority of our navy to all other maritime Powers, singly or allied, depended the safety of this country; for the navy was the palladium of our liberties, at once our honour and defence, with which stood or fell the reputation and the independence of the collective empire in the eyes and estimation of Europe and the world.

MR. COBDEN:—There are not two opinions in this Committee with reference to those patriotic maxims which the hon. and gallant Admiral has just put forth with his wonted emphasis. There is no one in this House who is not of opinion that England should maintain a navy superior to any other navy in the world. But there is no one in the world who denies our legitimate right to maintain such a navy, and there is therefore no necessity for our making it a ground of antagonism to, or of triumph over, other countries. From our insular position, we, having no communication with the rest of the world except by sea, are entitled to have a larger fleet than other countries, in order to guard our commerce, which is larger than that of any other maritime State. No one disputes our legitimate right to that position. But the efficiency and the strength of a navy does not necessarily, in our days, depend upon the number of men that may be voted for it. Put 100,000 sailors—the very best in the world—on board ships that now belong to our navy, and there is not a nautical authority here or elsewhere who will deny that a score of iron clad vessels which may be now in existence on the other side of the Atlantic, with not one-twentieth the number of sailors on board of them, would destroy the whole of this fleet, crews and all. It is no longer a question of mere brute force and of numbers; it is a question of science, of skill—in fact, of intellect. Therefore, if I take exception to the vote of 76,000 men for our navy this year, I am not to be accused on that account of being unpatriotic, or of being disposed to maintain a less force than other countries. I object to the number of 76,000 men for this reason—I defy you to employ these men in ships in which they can be of use to the country. 76,000 is the number you employed in the Crimean war; it is a war establishment. The Americans, who are this year carry-on a war, and have 2,500 miles of coast to blockade, employ 26,000 seamen. Their Naval Estimates are under £13,000,000, while we are going to vote £11,000,000 and 76,000 men. What are you going to do with all these sailors? A very large number must, undoubtedly, be employed in those big wooden line-of-battle ships which have, unhappily, been built by the precipitation of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington) and by the gross inconsistency of my noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty. I say gross inconsistency, because six years ago the noble Lord told us in this House that the day for line-of-battle ships was gone by. “The fate of empires,” said the noble Lord—I will use his own words—“will not in future depend on line-of-battle ships; they are not suited to the modern mode of warfare.” Other very high nautical authorities have preached the same doctrine. I heard the late Admiral Napier declare, a short time before his death, that a line-of-battle ship struck with one of your modern percussion shells, would have a hole in her side large enough, as he said, to drive a wheelbarrow through. What said the hon. and gallant Officer the Member for Harwich (Captain Jarvis)? In my own hearing he said that a wooden line-of-battle ship, hit by these modern percussion shells, would be nothing but a slaughter-house. Now, I ask any nautical man, “Would you, if you were at war with America to-morrow, send one of your wooden line-of-battle ships, with 700 or 800 men on board, and with 30 or 40 tons of gunpowder under their feet, to meet a vessel like the Monitor?” You know you would not. I heard the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) once declare his opinion that the Minister who should send a wooden line-of-battle ship to encounter these modern shell guns would deserve to be impeached. I do not presume to speak my own opinion on these matters; all the merit I claim is for being docile enough to learn from those who know better than I can. I take the authority of the ablest nautical men. Admiral Halsted also tells us, from experiment, that nine rounds from these modern shell guns will ignite a wooden vessel into a mass of flames wholly extinguishable. If this be the case, these great wooden line-of-battle ships and frigates are useless for the purposes of war, and you have 20,000 or 30,000 seamen now floating about in vessels which you would not use in time of war. Well, I challenge any naval officer in this House to get up and say that one of these line-of-battle ships would be opposed to an iron-clad gunboat in the present day; and if he does, I will bow to his authority. But if he does not, I hold that you are mispending a vast amount of money in maintaining these seventy-four line-of-battle ships, including coastguard vessels, which would be utterly useless in time of war, and your large wooden frigates may also be classed in the same category. Is it not absurd, then, to be manning these vessels, or a large proportion of them, under the delusive idea that you thereby increase your strength? You are really doing quite the reverse. I will tell you what you are doing—you are running your expenditure up to a point which makes your people clamour for a reduction, and you are straining the elasticity of those finances which you should husband for war. Surely it would be much wiser to have 20,000 fewer sailors than to keep them floating about in vessels which all your naval authorities admit would never again be fit for warfare. I say, then, that you do not show me, that if we vote these 76,000 seamen, you are going to make a good use of them, and therefore I object to the number of the men. And, observe, in objecting to the number of the men, I am objecting to your whole naval expenditure; because my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) must have been a very inattentive listener to what occurs in this House if he does not know that it is a maxim, derived from the oldest authorities—and I have heard it over and over again from men like the late Sir James Graham, than whom I am aware of no higher authority—it is a recognised maxim, that when you have voted the number of men, you have practically voted the expenditure of the navy in all its departments, for the expenditure of all those departments depends upon the number of your men. We have the same thing laid down in the Report of the Committee of this House. Then, what is the meaning of this reduction which is proposed? I was rather surprised at my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose making so many concessions about the reduction of a million in stores. But if you do not reduce the number of your men, your present reduction in stores means only that you will buy more stores next year. There cannot be a doubt of that. My hon. Friend said the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty was apologetic in his tone; but my hon. Friend himself was too apologetic for the Government in his remarks. This is really no permanent reduction. Nay, more, I do not believe you can keep 76,000 men afloat in vessels fit for any useful purpose for anything like £10,500,000 of money; and I will tell you why. There is a principle in the progress of our armaments which hon. Members must take into account—and that is, that your vessels are constantly increasing in price and value. A line-of-battle ship which used to cost £100,000, now costs you, with iron armour, £350,000. Why are you spending this extra money for each ship? Certainly to make her more effective. But, surely, if you make her more effective, you do not want the same number of men to give you the same force. In the navy, as in private enterprise, all these improvements should economize labour by machinery. If you lay out this vast capital in expensive ships, you need fewer men, because you cannot and do not require to keep the same number of ships afloat. Why, if one of these iron-clad gunboats can go in among your great wooden vessels like a lion among a flock of sheep, that implies that you gain an enormously increased force by their construction. The same thing applies to frigates. If you build them in the same way, you do not want so many of them, nor so many sailors; and yet you will be stronger at sea; for I say your present preparation is weakness not strength. That point is illustrated in a table which I have in my hand. The Agincourt has been referred to. She is of 6,021 tons, and throws a broadside of 1,322 lb. weight—that is, three times the broadside, and nearly three times the tonnage of the Victory, in which Nelson won the battle of Trafalgar. But, instead of requiring 1,200 men, like the Victory, the Agincourt requires only 704; thus showing that as you increase your investment of capital in these expensive vessels, you require fewer men to work them, and yet they are stronger—three times stronger if you put wood against iron. Do not, therefore, run away with the fallacy that you must always keep these 76,000 men afloat in ships. I tell you, if you are to float 76,000 men in ships that you would think of sending out were you at war with America to-morrow, you must spend, not ten, but twenty millions of money. We have seen how rapid the transitions are from one description of ship to another. It is the same in everything. It is only just within the last few years that men of genius, the mechanicians of the age, have been directing their attention to the new armaments. It is only lately, or since the Crimean war—when all the great Powers set to work as if to prepare them for the coming hostilities—that your Armstrongs, Whitworths, and Fairbairns were drawn from civil life to devote themselves to the invention of these armaments and implements of destruction. You have only begun this, and yet how rapidly you have been going on. I will give an illustration of this which nautical men will understand. I sat upon the Committee on the Navy in 1848. We examined Sir Thomas

Hastings, who told us he had no doubt whatever that to add a screw to a line-of-battle ship would make it a much less effective man-of-war. That is what was stated only fifteen years ago by Sir Thomas Hastings, the head of our gunnery establishment, and he was backed by other naval officers. What has since happened? Your sailing vessels have wholly disappeared. Well, I say our Governments have acted with something like madness—their conduct seems little short of sheer insanity—for they rushed into the building of wooden line-of-battle ships after they knew of the success of iron-clad vessels. You are now saddled with seventy-four of these wooden line-of-battle ships, and I defy you to produce any naval authority that would send them against a single iron-clad gunboat. Surely that ought to make us a little cautious about what we shall do for the future, and about what we are doing now. Is it possible, with these rapid transitions, that we can afford, rich though we are, to go upon a grand scale into all these novelties? With our stock of useless line-of-battle ships on our hands, can we now rush into building iron-clad vessels to the same extent and in the same way? Well, it seems to me, that that is just what we are going to do. We see now before us something like twenty of these iron-clad broadside port vessels—I say broadside port, because I am going to mention another class in a moment. Are we sure that ten years hence they will not share the same fate as these screw wooden line-of-battle ships? What says Captain Cowper Coles? My noble Friend has quoted him as an authority in these matters, and I believe from what I have heard of him—I can only presume to judge from what gentlemen of his own profession think of him—that he is deserving of the highest consideration from all who, like myself, have no technical knowledge of these matters. He leads us to expect that he is going to supersede these broadside vessels by his turret ships; and bear in mind that the Americans are hardly building anything except these turret or cupola ships, which they produce at the rate of about one every fortnight. Captain Coles, in a little tract, which I dare say has been sent to other Members as well as to myself, shows us what is the superiority of his cupola vessels over the broadside ships. His views are very startling, and, if correct, there can be no doubt we are running the greatest risk in constructing these broadside iron-clad vessels. He has given us a table showing in parallel columns the comparative number of men, draught of water, tonnage, and expense of ships throwing the same weight of metal on the broadside port system and the shield system. The Agin-court, of which we have heard so much, has a draught of 26 ft. 2 in., carries 704 men, throws 1,322 lb. weight of broadside, has a tonnage of 6,021 tons, and cost £385,342. Parallel to that vessel Captain Coles puts his turret ship, which only draws 22 ft. of water, carries 200 men, throws the same weight of broadside (1,322 lb.), has a tonnage of 3,272 tons, and cost only £203,518, thus yielding a saving of two-thirds of the number of men and nearly one-half the first outlay in money. But that is not all. Captain Coles tells us that these turret ships can throw a ball weighing 300 lb. or 400 lb., whereas a broadside port vessel can only throw a shot of 110 lb. He says that in America they are now mounting 15-inch cannon, firing solid shots of 450 lb. on all the iron-clad Monitors; and surely it does not require us to be sailors to know what chance a vessel throwing only 110 lb. shot would have against such an overpowering armament. That is Captain Coles's case; and if the facts and data which he supplies can be relied on, the conclusion to me seems irresistible that turret ships will as surely supersede the broadside vessel with ports as screw line-of-battle ships superseded the old-fashioned sailing vessels. In these turret ships there are no open ports through which shells can glide and men be hurt; and one advantage in connection with them is that you will not want so many sailors. They will stand hammering for half a day without losing scarcely a man, whereas, in wooden vessels, every action was attended with some loss. Do not let it be said that I am travelling ultra crepidam. Let any one give better authorities than I do, and I will bow to authority. But do not let it be said that we are incapable of using the facts and figures which we have in our possession—and that is all I pretend to do—do not let us go hand over head, turning a deaf ear to argument. My noble Friend let out a secret a little while ago; I should not have dreamt of attributing motives to him if he had not corroborated my suspicions. But I never could understand why it was that the Admiralty was buying such an enormous quantity of timber — why they should lay up a store of 112,000 loads, their former average consumption yearly not being a third of that amount. A friend told me last year, "That is all done by the people in the dockyard; the political officials at the head of the Department know nothing about it." At this moment they are filling the dockyards with timber; they are filling the quays also. They are so full that I believe the Port Admirals can hardly walk about. And this very superabundance of timber is then urged as a reason why they should build iron-clads in the dockyards, instead of having wholly iron vessels built by contract. I have no faith in the Admiralty. I have not the least faith in them. On that subject, and perhaps it is the only one on which I do coincide with him in opinion, I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck). The Admiralty have always been doing the wrong thing, or doing the right thing at the wrong time. They come forward each year with Estimates, and tell us everything is perfection. We heard to-night that the men are in an admirable state of discipline, that the Admiralty have got an admirable fleet, that they have got their dockyards full of timber, and that they only want to build some enormous docks in order that they may set work to spend twice as much money as ever. Now, who recommends you to clothe wood in iron? Does not such a course seem absurd? You would not veneer pasteboard with marble, and yet it seems just as rational to put iron upon wood. While you had old screw line-of-battle ships which you wanted to use up and disguise, there might be some excuse for taking off a couple of decks and covering the rest with iron; but if the House will listen to authority, and not to the Admiralty, it will stop building any more wooden vessels to be afterwards clothed with iron. What says Sir William Armstrong; what says Mr. Fairbairn; what does Sir Morton Peto say? These are men who, from their professional pursuits, know what the result of placing iron upon wood will be; and they have all emphatically declared that not a vessel ought to be constructed of wood, cased with iron, because you are thereby putting a harder and more rigid substance on a softer and more flexible one, and the foundation will give way. If the Admiralty will suspend the building of monster broadside ships until they have allowed Captain Coles to try his experiment with turret ships, we shall be better able to judge of their relative merits. Why cannot they allow his ship to be finished? It was in 1861 that he tried his experiments and satisfied the Admiralty with his plan. There is a vessel now in Portsmouth dockyard which is being converted into a turret ship; and I predict it will not be finished till next March twelve months, though the noble Lord says it will be ready in October or November next. I believe anything which the noble Lord tells me, but the Admiralty I never believe at all. Why not wait and see what comes of this contest between the cupola and the broadside? If you build your ships entirely of iron five or six inches thick—and that is the substance of all I have to say—the better opinion is that they will be practically indestructible, and, wanting only a few coats of paint, they will be as durable as Southwark Bridge or the Chain Pier at Brighton. Build them entirely of iron—build as few as you can—and your ships will be more secure, while the machinery supplied to them will enable them to be worked with fewer men, and in the end, instead of increasing the Navy Estimates, we shall be able to diminish them. I warn the Committee against supposing that it will always be necessary to keep up a force of 76,000 men and boys in order to be strong at sea. I am not about to move any reduction of men. I have been in this House twenty-two years nearly, and I have never known an Estimate altered once it had been brought in. The late Mr. Hume, who preceded me, told me that for forty years he had never known Estimates altered after they had been brought forward. But, mind you, when we refuse the income tax, as we did in 1848, the Government took back the Estimates, and managed before the end of the year very much to reduce them. And my respected Friend the late Mr. Hume told me that about 1816 or 1817, when the income tax was likewise refused, the Government took back the Estimates and reduced them enormously. And therefore, if my hon. Friends who seem inclined to take some steps in this matter, want to get a reduction of the Estimates, it must be by letting the Government know that there are some men connected with manufacturing and industrial interests whose business and function it ought to be to see that this waste of public money does not take place, who are determined that if the noble Lord at the head of the Government does not reduce the expenditure, somebody else for whom we will not be responsible may be called on to undertake the task. Let the Government know beforehand the fate which will attend extraordinary Estimates, and depend upon it they will no longer be produced. I thank you for hearing me; and, holding the opinions which I have just expressed, I do not intend to trouble you with a Vote.

MR. LAIRD said, there were one or two points as to which he should be glad to have some further explanation from the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty. An item of £4,000,000 appeared in the Estimates for dockyard purposes, including salaries and various charges, such as timber, iron, and coal, but no details were given how the money was spent; how much for repairs, how much for new ships. If these items were given, the House would have an opportunity of seeing what they got for their money at the end of the year. From the statement made that night by the noble Lord, it would appear that the Surveyor of the Navy estimated the cost of repairs of ships of the navy at £760,000. If the expenditure under that head were very largely increased, it would still leave between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000 for the construction of new vessels. Putting down the cost of the iron-cased ships at £70 a ton, £2,000,000 sterling ought to produce 30,000 tons of shipping. But nothing like this amount was obtained for the money, and it was therefore desirable that on this point the House should have some information. He quite agreed with the opinion which had just been expressed with regard to Captain Coles' cupola ship. He had considered that question very fully, and believed that they would create a great revolution in naval architecture. For this reason he regretted extremely that the first ship of this class the Admiralty had undertaken to build was not to be ready until October. Everything that it was possible to do should be done to expedite its progress, as the result of the experiments might be to alter entirely the construction of our ships; and he had no doubt iron armour-plates could have been had in abundance, and if the work had been pushed on as it ought to have been, the vessel might have been ready. We could only carry our improved ordnance in cupola ships, not in broadside ships. We therefore could not go on in our old-fashioned way; we must adapt our ships to the requirements of the age. The heaviest guns could be easily worked by machinery in the cupola ships. He was glad to hear the noble Lord speak so highly of Captain Coles' invention of tripod masts. He had seen the plans, and, believing them to be excellent, he hoped they would be adopted. They ought not to go on building ships that would shake to pieces in a few years. In the case of the old wooden vessels that had been lengthened, the guns had to be taken away fore and aft, and it was not to be expected that they would be stronger for having 1,000 tons of iron hanging at their sides. He wanted to see the Royal Sovereign and Royal Oak tried. He would say, let the Black Prince and Warrior be docked and examined, to test their condition; do not commission the other ships, but transfer to them the captains and crews of the Warrior and Black Prince, and, if they stood as well as the iron ships, he would admit he had been mistaken. As to the comparative wear and tear of iron and wooden vessels there could be no contest. He thought they had better spend a million in docks for these large ships than spend a million for wooden ships that would not stand wear and tear at all. He was glad to corroborate the views of the hon. Member opposite, and he hoped the Admiralty would get Mr. Reed's first vessel, the Enterprise, and Captain Coles' Royal Sovereign, ready as speedily as possible, to enable them to determine whether their plans were good before they were called on to spend large sums of money in similar structures.

MR. LINDSAY said, that the Vote for men, instead of being reduced, was greatly augmented, because the Royal Naval Reserve was increased by 7,000 or 8,000 over last year. If science was good for anything, its application should lessen the number of men required in our ships. As to the Warrior, she would cope with half a dozen line-of-battle ships. Her complement was 650 men; whereas the complement of six line-of-battle ships would be 5,000 or 6,000 men; so that they were actually voting a far greater number of men than they had efficient ships to put them in. They were told that they had 112,000 loads of timber in the dockyards: the annual consumption, when they were building wooden ships, was 30,000 loads; so that the stock on hand was enough to last four or five years, according to the old average; now, however, they were going to discontinue the building of wooden ships. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Laird), than whom no man could speak with better authority on the subject said, that wooden ships coated with iron were not efficient, that was the opinion of every person who was competent to form one on the subject. In 1855 it was evident that the days of wooden ships were at an end. In 1856 he (Mr. Lindsay) brought forward a Motion, to the effect that the building of wooden ships should be discontinued; but since that time they had spent about eleven millions sterling in wooden ships—a dead loss to the country. The question to consider was, whether the turret ships were sea-going vessels, and would they be as efficient as the Warrior, and they knew that turret vessels in America were only used for blockading purposes, and were utterly unfit to cross the Atlantic. Under these circumstances he would sell a large portion of the timber in stock, which would realize a good price; and if it were still considered advisable to case wooden ships with iron plates, he would cut down some of the useless line-of-battle ships, and coat them with armour. The question it was very important to consider was, would the turret ships be as good sea-ships as the Warrior class? He had visited the iron fleet in the Tagus, and had put various questions to Captain Cochrane as to the sea-going qualities of his ship; in reply to which that gallant officer stated that he had been in the Warrior in some very heavy gales, and he never was in an easier or safer ship. He would encounter any weather in her. As to the efficiency of the ship in resisting shot, he put this question, “Suppose an extreme case—that we were unfortunately involved in war with America—New York stood on a peninsula; suppose a battery at three several points, that outside of all you had to encounter one Monitor, then two Monitors, and that you must run the gauntlet through them to get into the open water, and to command the town of New York; would you, under those circumstances, and looking to the risk of getting out again—would you run the Warrior through the gauntlet?” Captain Cochrane replied, that considering the object to be one of great importance, he should not hesitate to do so. The only thing which he would fear would be a chance shot to injure her rudder, which was not adequately protected, but the chance was a remote one. Captain Wainwright, of the Black Prince gave a similar reply, and Captains Phillimore and Chamberlain, commanding respectively the Defence and the Resistance, said also they should have no hesitation, if their vessels had the same speed as the Warrior and Black Prince. The conclusion, therefore, was, that so far as our knowledge at present extended those ships were practically invulnerable. With respect to the discipline of the crews, he had been struck by a marked improvement. Captain Cochrane, who had not flogged any man on board his vessel, said, in reply to a question, that he did not think it would be prudent to abolish the power of flogging. Having taken pains to ascertain the feeling of the seamen, he had found (strange to say) that the great majority of the good seamen did not desire to see that power abolished. A Russian captain had told him that flogging in their navy was controlled by Government regulations, but it was found that among their crews the flogging was administered by the men to those whom they thought to be deserving of it, and the practice was winked at by the officers. The noble Lord had said that by April next we should have eighteen iron-cased ships ready, but he did not state the amount of tonnage. Would the noble Lord also tell the Committee what our neighbours were doing, and what number of ships and the amount of tonnage the French would have in April next?

MR. BENTINCK said, the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) was good enough to express his surprise that there was some one point on which they could agree. His (Mr. Bentinck's) surprise was quite equal to that of the hon. Member; and he might further add that it was very improbable that such a coincidence would ever occur again. The speech of his noble and gallant Friend the Secretary for the Admiralty had been described as apologetic; but if it had been really so, he (Mr. Bentinck) should not have felt it necessary to address the House. His noble and gallant Friend took exception to his having made use of this opportunity to go into the question of the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, and said it ought to have been passed over on this occasion. But he believed the constitution of that Board was the turning point of the whole question; and if they were to be precluded from going into that subject, which was the cause of their large expenditure, there was no need to discuss the Navy Estimates at all. There was another point. At the commencement of his speech the noble Lord took credit for not entering into any comparison of the strength of British and foreign navies; but if this were so, upon what did he rest his case? What ground had he for asking for a single shilling unless he was prepared to say that it was required for the defence of the country; and how could he say that unless he considered the state of foreign navies? He (Mr. Bentinck) contended that the whole case rested upon a comparison between the naval forces of this and other countries. It seemed to him, with all due deference, that the remarks of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) were very peculiar and somewhat illogical. He himself had not the good fortune to be a gentleman of extremely Liberal opinions, and perhaps he did not therefore quite understand how these matters affected persons with such opinions, and therefore possibly he did not quite understand the hon. Gentleman's argument. The hon. Gentleman objected to the great number of men required for the navy; and having said this, he went on to admit that we ought to have, not only a sufficient force, but a force larger than that of any other country in the world—which was all that he (Mr. Bentinck) had been contending for. He went on to say that the time had come for effecting a great saving in our Naval Estimates; but how, in the name of all that was marvellous—unless, indeed, we reconstructed the Admiralty—could we combine these two things? He could not understand the hon. Member for Montrose and the hon. Member for Rochdale saying that it was right to Vote these Estimates, and then going on to add that the Estimates were enormous.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the hon. Member for Rochdale having made some very striking observations on the subject of turret ships, he wished to assure him, and the House, that the Admiralty were anxious to get on with those ships as fast as possible. But it must be borne in mind, that the iron plates for these ships had to go through the proper testing process, and many had been rejected, being of indifferent quality and tending to delay the construction. It was true, that the hon. Member for Birkenhead's two talented sons were building a turret ship, which would, perhaps, be finished before that of the Admiralty. But, was he prepared to have the plates previously tested by firing 68 lb. shot at them? Or would he let him have a shot at her when she was finished? The hon. Member for Rochdale was a great admirer of the turret ships, and he had spoken as Captain Coles spoke of the amount of broadside to which the turrets were equal, but both of these gentlemen forgot that ships in naval battles were often engaged on both sides at the same time, and on such occasions the turrets would, of course, be at a disadvantage as compared with broadsides. His hon. Friend asked, why they went on building wooden ships? They could not dispense with the use of wood, for these iron-plated vessels had a backing of eighteen inches of wood. The only way of avoiding the great concussion which shot would produce on an iron vessel was by giving it a wooden backing, or cushion. It was said that the timber would rot. No doubt it would. But they were trying a French plan, for preventing that, by charring the wood. The hon. Member for Birkenhead said, "You never tell us what is the cost of the ships, and we have no means of getting at that fact." His hon. Friend was mistaken in that respect, for there was laid annually on the table a statement of the cost of every ship in the navy; and if hon. Members studied that statement, they would make themselves acquainted with such matters. That account was prepared by the Accountant General of the Navy, and it was one on which the House could rely, not only for the cost of every ship, but of every article made in the dockyards. The hon. Member asked, why they did not try Captain Coles' tripod masts? His answer was, why did not some of the merchant princes try them? They would be equally useful in the merchant service as in the navy if successful. Why should the country pay for the trial of every new invention? Let the merchant service try them, and if found successful, the Government would be happy to adopt them in the navy. The hon. Member for Rochdale, said that by using the armour-plated ships they would be relieved of the expense of maintaining a large mass of men. But the necessity for the large mass of men was not occasioned by the line-of-battle ships, but by the numerous little vessels which were employed as cruisers all over the world. Twenty line-of-battle ships required only 500 blue jackets each, or 10,000 men, which was a small number out of the whole amount of men in the navy. He hoped the eloquence of the hon. Member would not induce the House to agree to any reduction of the number of the men.

MR. COBDEN said, that there were two classes of iron vessels—one where the frame was of timber, and the other where, as in the Warrior, the frame was of iron, but required a backing of wood. Now, his noble Friend said that he wanted 112,000 loads of timber. He applied to a ship-builder for information as to how many loads of timber would be required for the construction of a ship like the Warrior. And the answer he received was, that 400 loads would be sufficient for backing the Warrior with timber, but that 6,000 would be required if the Warrior was to be built entirely of timber. But the backing of the battery was of teak, and teak did not require to be seasoned. Therefore his noble Friend did not give a sufficient justification for his keeping in store 112,000 loads of timber, and he hoped it would be sold.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH feared that the Admiralty were not using sufficient despatch in the construction of the turret ship, and recommended that all the plates which were ready for use, should be applied to that vessel, instead of some of them being diverted to other ships. They ought to know what these turret ships would do, because, if successful, they ought to build more of them, and save the expense of building an inferior description of ships. With regard to the appointment of Mr. Reed as chief Constructor of the Navy. Mr. Reed had never been in the School of Naval architecture. He had merely been an apprentice in the dockyards, and served a year and a half at Sheerness. Having left that yard—and there was a rule that no one who voluntarily discharged himself from a naval yard should be employed again—he had become editor of the Mechanics' Magazine. He had never built a ship in his life, and was now building a ship which was only an experiment, and might be a failure. There was in this no reason why he should be placed over men who had built some of the fastest and finest ships in the navy, and he hoped that his appointment was not so far settled that the matter might not be reconsidered.

(1.) 76,000 Men and Boys for Sea and Coast Guard Services, including 18,000 Royal Marines ;

As were also the following Votes :—

(2.) £2,921,951, Wages.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ;
Committee to sit again on Wednesday.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving the second reading of the Tobacco Duties Bill, said, that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) having given notice of a Motion for referring the subject to a Select Committee—which Motion it would be his duty to oppose—he did not intend to make a speech on the merits on the present occasion. He would therefore simply advert to one or two Amendments which it would be his duty hereafter to move in Committee. Since he moved the Resolution on which the introduction of the Bill was founded, he had had an opportunity of communicating with the various parties interested ; and the result was that he had been convinced of the general soundness of its provisions and the correctness of rates of duty imposed. One Amendment was of a verbal character, and another was in the nature of an adjustment of duty with regard to one particular class of commodity introduced under this Bill. The first Amendment, of a verbal character, related to the importation of Cavendish tobacco. The intention of the Government was that, so far as the material employed for the manufacture of Cavendish tobacco, the holders of British and foreign tobacco were to be placed on the same footing. The question was, whether the powers of the Bill as it stood at the present moment enabled the Government to enforce as to foreign Cavendish the same restrictions as in the case of British Cavendish. The Government believed they had this power ; but there ought to be no doubt on so important a point, and he should propose in Committee to apply the same restraint as to the manufacture of foreign Cavendish which was applied in the present Bill in respect to British Cavendish—namely, to prevent the importation of foreign Cavendish tobacco containing the leaves of plants other than the tobacco plant. That Amendment would in the third clause. The other alteration related to that portion of the trade carried on in the sister island. It had been shown to be requisite to introduce some small adjustment in the rate of duty in regard to the manufacture of Irish snuff. The rate proposed for snuff was 3s. 9d. per lb., and that was an ample rate of duty to counteract the direct and indirect consequences of the Customs law, not only as affected snuff of British manufacture, but snuff in general. But with regard to the snuff manufactured in Ireland it was a peculiar and technical preparation, being what was called “high-dried” or “high-toasted snuff,” and its manufacture required a larger portion of duty-paid material. A change would be proposed in Committee, although not an important one, with regard to this article. He mentioned these points because the proposed Amendment tended to raise a discussion which he wished to anticipate. He should content himself with moving that the Bill be now read a second time, and reserve his remarks on the Bill until after the speech of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE:—What will be amount of the change in Irish snuff?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER:—I will lay the particulars on the table to-morrow.

MR. AYRTON said, it was rather late (a quarter past one o'clock) to begin a discussion of this kind. He thought that the Bill had been introduced under a great misapprehension of the facts connected with the question. The subject was by no means a new one. The duty on tobacco was, indeed, one of the oldest levied, inasmuch as it had formed the subject of fiscal legislation ever since the reign of Charles II., and from that time to the present every sort of change had been made in the tobacco laws, and investigations had been conducted by Committees and Commissions of Excise and Customs. When the law was settled on its present basis, some discontent was felt by the trade. A Select Committee was obtained by Mr. Hume. A Resolution was proposed in that Committee, by Dr. Bowring, to the effect, that in order to prevent smuggling and adulteration, and to guard the public revenue, it was desirable that a considerable reduction should be made from the then existing high rate of duty; but the Government of the day (the late Sir Robert Peel's), which was represented in the Committee by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, opposed the Motion, and carried an Amendment which stated that no such reduction could be effected without causing so large a loss to revenue as to involve the most serious financial consequences. The result was that the tobacco duties were left in the position in which they then stood, and under that system the trade had continued to work up to the present time. But, before he proceeded further, he was anxious to point out some of the peculiarities by which the trader in that commodity was surrounded. It was a manufacture which, at its very outset, was met by the most extraordinary restrictions, the growth of tobacco having been prohibited from the time of Charles II. most rigorously in this country. The law which enforced that prohibition had at one time been relaxed in favour of Ireland, and the growth of tobacco had begun to extend in that country considerably, when it was stopped by the law being placed on the same footing as in England. No one, he might add, was at liberty to deal with tobacco, when imported, except under particular regulations. The manufacturer was allowed to mix nothing with it but water, which he might use for the purpose of moistening it; nor, having once imported it, was he allowed to export it, except on certain conditions. There was, besides, an infinite variety of other restrictions, to the breach of every one of which a severe penalty was attached, so that the dealer in tobacco required to be constantly on his guard. Now, it was said that the duty on it was originally imposed for the purpose of protecting the English manufacturer, and that the object of the Bill before the House was to modify the present system. Those who took that view, however, laboured, he thought, under a misapprehension; for it so happened, that at the period when protection was looked upon as a useful system, there was no differential duty at all between manufactured and unmanufactured tobacco, it being only in modern times that it had been found necessary to make a distinction between the two, and it was quite clear that the imposition of the differential duty was entirely for the sake of revenue. A great misapprehension, he might also observe, prevailed with respect to the duty on cigars; the only cigars, he believed, ever imported under the existing law, with some trifling exceptions, being of two kinds, the Havannah and the Manilla, of which the former was quite an exotic commodity, of very limited growth, while the latter was a Royal monopoly of a limited character, selling at a factitious price. The Havannah cigars, he might add, varied in value from 10s. to 30s. per pound, the average being 13s., and the duty was 9s. per pound, while the Manilla paid the same duty, the average value being 7s. per pound. That could scarcely be regarded as an oppressive rate by the rich, when it was taken into account that the poorer classes paid a duty of 3s. 2d. on tobacco, the average price of which was 8d. per pound. Since the present rates of duty were established, a very large manufacture of cigars had sprung up in this country, furnishing employment for some 4,000 workmen, besides a considerable number of masters. He might also observe that the number of real Havannahs was exceedingly small, the great mass of cigars consumed in this country being really manufactured here. While the demand for Havannahs was far greater than the number which could be manufactured for consumption, a Royal monopoly raised the price of the Manilla; so that no change of duty could materially influence the sale of these two classes. But it was not only against the operation of the revenue laws that the English manufacturer had to contend; the difficulties of his trade were increased by the caprices of those who bought cigars, who valued them by their size and not by their weight, and required that the outer leaf should be without blemish; that they should possess a delicate flavour, and that they should burn to a white ash. The manufacturer must buy a large bale of tobacco, which he must take at a venture, for he does not know until he works it what it will make, and to find leaves without blemish is difficult. Then the stalk and other hard parts which are not suited for the manufacture of cigars must be left out, and yet duty had been paid on all these; while the amount to which he was able to indemnify himself by selling the waste to the manufacturers of snuff was growing less and less, because the demand for snuff was diminishing day by day. Under those circumstances, the House would understand how keen the competition was under which the trade carried on their business. In point of fact, so small were the profits and so difficult of realization that he had heard of persons who, misled by statements which they had seen in the papers, had engaged in the manufacture and had been obliged to give it up. It was quite clear that the manufacture was carried on as economically as possible. The question which the House had to consider was whether this complicated system of Excise and Customs had attained the object for which it was devised. Had it repressed adulteration and smuggling? All the reports of late years, both of Excise and Customs, showed most conclusively that the manufacture in this country was in a sound and healthy state, and that there was no adulteration in cigars. The revenue officers were in the habit of going into shops and examining the cigars, and they had an infallible test of the genuineness of the cigar, and their evidence, when they said it was unadulterated, was surely worth something. He was speaking now of what was manufactured by licensed traders. Again, the Custom-house was equally satisfied that smuggling had been repressed. Of course it could not be entirely put down, because sailors were accustomed to bring in a pound or a half pound of tobacco, which could be easily twisted into any shape, but they meddled very little with cigars. But the Custom-house authorities warned them against precipitating any change with respect to the laws affecting this trade, for in their last Report they mentioned that when, upon the late remission of the Customs duties, they were disposed to concede to the merchants of this country the liberty of importing boxes and packages, they found boxes of cigars were introduced as boxes of toys. There was another point well worthy of consideration, which was that the revenue had steadily increased for the last thirty years: for the import of tobacco for consumption had increased from 1831 to 1841 360,000 lbs. yearly, from 1841 to 1851, 490,000 lbs. yearly, and from 1851 to 1861, 650,000 lbs. yearly. Up to this time, when there was no competition with the foreign manufacturer of cigars, it was the interest of the English trader to keep up the weight of his commodity, because diminution of weight was so much dead loss to him when once he had paid the duty. But the effect of this change would be, to make it the interest of foreign manufacturers to make their cigars as light as possible, so that they might get in the largest number at the lowest duty. Such was the extraordinary nature of the tobacco-leaf that it was capable of being increased or diminished in weight 100 per cent—it was just like a sponge—and therefore the manufacturers on the Continent were able to make the cigar extremely light. Before we arrived at the present law there was free trade in manufacturing tobacco. The Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day allowed every one to do what he liked with it. This went on for two years, but at the end of that time every one was so disgusted with the article as manufactured that they begged of his successor to put an end to the system. On the Continent, where they act on principles the reverse of ours, they have a process by which they can take the commonest and cheapest tobacco, steep it in water, and subject it to other treatment so that the coarse parts are extracted, and a tobacco is produced which is mild to smoke and which yields a white ash, and these cigars would be imported at a duty much below that charged on the tobacco necessarily used in cigars made in England. He maintained that this was a subject which should be well examined before so important an amount of revenue as was raised from tobacco was touched. The foreign manufacturers had many advantages over the English; for the former worked the most worthless commodity as compared with the most valuable. In Germany it scarcely mattered to what class of persons the operation of fabricating was intrusted, and a great proportion of the cigars there were of prison manufacture; but in this country the costly commodity, enhanced in value by revenue charges, must be committed to careful hands, or a loss instead of a profit would result to the manufacturer. The effect of the present system was that smuggling and adulteration were put down in this country, because the manufacturers of tobacco were responsible for the genuineness of the article, and for its not being smuggled. When the people were starving, an agitation would arise, and the cry would be, "The rich man has reduced the duty on tobacco to 9s. on what has cost 13s., but the poor man pays 3s. 2d. on what costs 10d." No one would propose to put on a duty, and the Liverpool Reform Association would have a new argument for resistance to the duty on the raw material. The House would do well to inquire into the consequences of this change, to satisfy themselves that no inconvenience and no injury would ensue. It was proposed to allow the manufacture in bond of Cavendish tobacco. Cavendish tobacco was made by steeping it in a little rum, sugar, and water, and every one could make his own Cavendish tobacco if he chose to steep it and press it. There was no necessity for the change. But, as a commercial operation, the Bill was of such a character as was best described by one of the most earnest advocates for the privilege to manufacture Cavendish tobacco in bond, who said the provisions of the Bill for that purpose were the production of a madman. He would not go into the question of snuff, because it excited the people of Ireland, but he had shown how intimately the question of tobacco was mixed up with the manufacture of snuff. After every possible change, the present system, both as to duty and regulations, was found to be the only practical system to protect the revenue against smuggling and the public against adulteration; on both those points the present system was eminently successful. The state of the manufacture had not been properly considered. The only effect would be to give up a number of English workmen and honest people for the benefit of a few persons—princes who kept their prisoners for nothing in manufacturing tobacco, Royal monopolists who prohibited the export of the raw material, and Cuban slave-holders and slave-dealers, who would put in their pocket any difference in price which the diminished duty would yield. If there were those who had absolute faith in the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it must have been rudely shaken by the financial operations of the last three years. The whole philosophy on which the change in the wine duties had been made was entirely erroneous. Instead of very light wines being introduced into this country, the right hon. Gentleman had introduced wine up to 43 and 44 per cent of proof spirit, whereas before they had nothing higher than 33 per cent. They had, therefore, the right to assume the possibility of error on the present occasion; and when the whole body of manufacturers were declaring that there was error, the wise and prudent course was to examine into the whole question. He therefore moved the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the Laws for raising a Revenue on Tobacco,"

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. MARSH said, he was glad to hear the argument that the Bill would benefit the rich and not the poor, because it showed, that although that argument might be carried to the verge of cant, the poor, if unrepresented, were well considered in that House. But he was of opinion that the Bill would benefit the poor, because he had been in colonies where manufactured tobacco was permitted, and it was found more economical, as it could be easier carried, and did not waste so much. As to the English agriculturists not being allowed to grow tobacco, the answer was, that although they could grow tobacco in England, just as they could grow pumpkins and grapes, it was not suited to the soil; no landlord would allow it to be raised, because it was an exhausting crop, and it would never be grown except for the purpose of cheating the Excise. The best cigars were those which were imported, and the reason was that the aroma was preserved by their being manufactured before the leaf was dry. Another argument in favour of the manufacture taking place in the country where the plant was grown was the absence of the temptation by the abundance of the plant to introduce foreign and deleterious substances.

MR. COX moved that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped the House would not accede to that Motion. There was nothing so sacred or peculiar in the character of tobacco that it should be exempted from the ordinary rules of business in that House. The practice was to sit in Committee of Supply until one o'clock. It was now a quarter past twelve, and there was no reason why the discussion should be checked.

On Question, the House divided:—
Ayes 46; Noes 90: Majority 44.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

COLONEL DUNNE stated that a deputation had just come over from the tobacco trade in Ireland to ask for inquiry, or at least an opportunity of stating their case in regard to this measure. This was one of the few manufactures which Ireland possessed, and had a right to claim the consideration of the House. He would therefore move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. MAGUIRE, in seconding the Motion, observed, that 20,000 persons in Ireland were interested in this trade, and that one-third of the revenue which the Crown derived from this source of taxation came from that country. To expose the Irish manufacture to wholesale foreign competition would be to ruin it. He urged the right hon. Gentleman not to swamp a native industry when there was no real advantage to be secured in return.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was willing to consent to a Motion for the adjournment of the debate, but he could not agree to refer the subject to a Select Committee, which was, in fact, merely a mode of delaying the Bill and making legislation impossible for the present Session. The deputation from the Irish trade which he had seen had certainly not taken the same course as their representatives in this House. They had argued the details of the subject in a sensible and business-like manner with him, but not a word had they said of referring it to a Select Committee.

MR. AYRTON repudiated any wish to prevent legislation for this Session. There was ample time for inquiry.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate arising; Debate adjourned till Friday.

COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

NOMINATION OF COMMITTEE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved, "That the Committee of Public Accounts do consist of the following Members."

Motion made, and Question proposed.

MR. HENNESSY moved to suspend the Standing Order relative to this Committee, with the purpose of adding to the Committee the names of Colonel Dunne and Lord Robert Montagu. He complained that no Irish Member had been nominated on the Committee, though the subject had attracted great attention in Ireland during the recess; and an impression prevailed there that ever since the Union the accounts of the United Kingdom had been so juggled that great injustice had been done to Ireland.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Standing Order relative to the number of the said Committee be suspended,"—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped that the House would not allow the Standing Order to be disturbed. The hon. and learned Gentleman had divided the House several times on the question last year, and had always been defeated by large majorities. It was clear that the hon. Gentleman was confounding two distinct subjects—taxation and account; and, certainly, there could not be any allegation that injustice had been done to Ireland in the matter of accounts. [MR. HENNESSY: Most certainly there is.] If that were the case, it was strange that not a single instance had been brought before the Committee during the whole time of its sittings. The question was one which had no local relation, and the members had been selected solely from their presumed acquaintance with the subject.

COLONEL DICKSON said, that every word uttered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer showed the necessity of having an Irish Member on the Committee.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the people of Ireland were deeply interested in the subject to be considered by the Committee, and therefore it was only fair that one of their representatives should take part in the inquiry.

MR. BLAKE assured the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there were several important defects in the mode of rendering public accounts in Ireland. He hoped the Amendment would be agreed to.

Captain STACPOOLE, MR. MAGUIRE, and Lord CLAUD HAMILTON likewise supported the Amendment.

MR. KINNAIRD said no good reason for altering the constitution of the Committee, which appeared to him to be unobjectionable.

On Question, the House divided:—
Ayes 46; Noes 21: Majority 25.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Sir Francis Baring be one of the Members of the said Committee."

MR. HENNESSY said, he thought this was a case in which the minority ought to exercise their constitutional privilege, even though they might have to keep dividing till four or five o'clock in the morning. The Committee on Public Accounts had made several mistakes with respect to Irish finance. He moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

SIR FRANK CROSSLEY appealed to the hon. Gentleman to give way. The minority ought to yield to the majority.

MR. MAGUIRE begged to remind the hon. Baronet that his hon. Friend was only exercising his constitutional right. The responsibility must be thrown on the Government of their refusal to put one Irish Member on the Committee. It would only be a graceful and generous thing of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to yield to the unanimous wish of the Irish Members.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER insisted, that there was nothing local in the inquiries of the Committee. There was no objection to place an Irishman on the Committee. If there was a vacancy on the Committee, the question would be considered. At present, however, nine gentlemen had sat on the Committee, and it was desirable that they should be reappointed.

COLONEL DICKSON would support his hon. Friend in every division which he might think proper to take in the endeavour to obtain the appointment of an Irish Member upon this Committee.

COLONEL DUNNE entertained the same feeling with regard to this appointment, though, as his name had been mentioned in connection with the Committee, he had hitherto neither voted nor spoken on the subject; but he now hoped that his hon. Friend would not persevere in his Motion.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, there was deep dissatisfaction throughout Ireland at the systematic exclusion of Irish Members from this sort of Committee; and it was suspected there that the Government adopted this course in revenge for the rejection of their candidates upon the hustings in Ireland.

On Question, the House divided:—
Ayes 12; Noes 39: Majority 27.

Question again proposed, "That Sir Francis Baring be one of the Members of the said Committee."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON had no doubt that an Irish Member would be found fit to act on the Committee if a vacancy occurred.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That Sir Francis Baring be one of the Members of the said Committee," put, and agreed to.

MR. EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, MR. PEARL, MR. GEORGE CARE GLYN, MR. COBURN, SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY, MR. HOWES, and MR. WALFOL nominated other Members of the said Committee.

MARRIAGES (IRELAND) BILL.

Bill to amend the Law relating to Marriages in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by SIR EDWARD GREGAN, MR. VANCE, and MR. LONGFIELD.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 32.]

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, February 24, 1863.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS.—Second Reading.—English Church Services in Wales [E.L.] (No. 7).

PRIVATE BILLS.

Ordered, That this House will not receive any Petition for a Private Bill after

Tuesday the 24th Day of March next, unless such Private Bill shall have been approved by the Court of Chancery; nor any Petition for a Private Bill approved by the Court of Chancery after Tuesday the 12th Day of May next:

Ordered, That this House will not receive any Report from the Judges, upon Petitions presented to this House for Private Bills, after Tuesday the 12th Day of May next:

Ordered, That the said Orders be printed and published, and affixed on the Doors of this House and Westminster Hall. (No. 21.)

EAST GLOUCESTERSHIRE RAILWAY BILL.—SECOND READING.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD moved the second reading of this Bill. The noble Lord said, he was wholly unconnected with the district which this railway would traverse, but he happened to be on the Committee of last year which sanctioned this scheme. The present Bill simply asked for an extension of the time granted by the Act of last Session, which was promoted by local proprietors for the purpose of shortening the distance by railway between London and Cheltenham twenty-one miles, and for opening up a district of country at present destitute of railway accommodation. The scheme was originally promoted by the Great Western Railway Company, but that company had lately seen fit to withdraw their support. He believed there was no objection to an extension of the time asked.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^o.

LORD REDESDALE said, he must oppose the Motion, on the ground that the Standing Orders of Parliament had not been properly complied with. It appeared that some local proprietors had come forward and subscribed £120,000 as their share towards the costs of the undertaking, and that the Great Western Railway Company had subscribed the remainder of the sum (£440,000) necessary for making up the amount of capital, and had also guaranteed to pay 4 per cent interest on the £120,000. He was of opinion that the Great Western Company had acted in a very imprudent manner in the course they had adopted. The House could not enter into questions between the parties, but ought to confine themselves to the question whether the promoters of the scheme had done their duty or not. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months.")

VISCOUNT LIFFORD hoped that the Bill would not be rejected on this occasion, but that a fortnight's delay would be granted to the promoters to consider the matter.

LORD REDESDALE said, he was unable to see why there should be any delay at all. The promoters had had plenty of time to perform their duty. He knew nothing at all of the merits of the scheme.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, their Lordships were asked to reject this Bill without having received any information which could lead them to form a correct judgment on the matter. He thought the Bill ought to be sent before a Select Committee and be treated with fairness, and their Report would decide what should be done. He would, if in order, move that the debate be adjourned.

After a short discussion,

ENGLISH CHURCH SERVICES IN WALES BILL [H.L.]—(No. 7.)

SECOND READING.

THE BISHOP OF BANGOR moved that the English Church Services in Wales Bill be now read the second time. Considerable inconvenience had been occasioned by the present state of the law, which required that in all parishes in that country in which Welsh was the language commonly spoken, Divine Service should be performed in that language. A large number of English families were scattered through these parishes; and not understanding the language, they were virtually deprived of the benefit of assembling for public worship. The object of the present Bill was to meet this state of things. It empowered the Bishops of Welsh dioceses to make provision for the performance of Divine Service in the English language by licensing any building in any parish where the ordinary parochial Services are required by law to be in the Welsh tongue; and to nominate and license a Minister of such place. The licensed building was not to be a parochial chapel, nor were the rights of the Incumbent to be affected thereby. The necessity for some such measure was apparent, and he therefore

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

VOLUNTEER FORCE.—QUESTION.

LORD STRATHEDEN asked the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to enforce that part of the Report of the Volunteer Commission which recommends the Delay of Brigade and Divisional Field Days until the end of the Battalion Drill Season? The noble Lord said that it had been found by experience that when the brigade or divisional field day was held early in the year the men fell off from attendance on the ordinary drill for the rest of the year. It was therefore desirable that the annual gatherings should be postponed to as late a period of the year as possible.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON assured the noble Lord, that Her Majesty's Government was most anxious to carry out all the recommendations of the Royal Commission as far as possible. The recommendations varied in their character; some of them formed the subject of propositions to be submitted to Parliament, and required alterations in the law, others were only suggestions for the advantage of the Volunteer force, and were not suitable for strict regulations. No doubt there was great force in the arguments of the Commissioners on this subject, and he had heard from other sources, and learned from the evidence taken before the Commissioners, that it had been found, that when the more important field days of the year had been held in the early part of spring, it had been difficult for commanding officers to induce the members of their corps to come up to drill with the same zeal; and the drill thus falling off, had an injurious effect on the efficiency of the corps. But, it must be borne in mind, that there was another side to this question. Although it was quite true, that it was desirable that these great displays of the year should be postponed as late as convenient, they should not forget that they could only take place on certain occasions, when it was possible to bring together a great body of Volunteers—that was to say, when the convenience of members of corps rendered it possible for them to give up a whole day for that purpose. That could only take place on a very few days in the year, and it had been found that, of all days, the one on which the greatest mass of Volunteers could be got together was Easter Monday. The noble Lord had suggested Whit Monday. If that day was equally convenient, it would be an advantage, no doubt, to have the principal field day then; but so long as Easter Monday was the general holiday of the year, it was not unreasonable to choose that as the most convenient day for displays of this kind. The Government had not power to call Volunteers out for any purpose of this description in time of peace, and the appointment of the day and place rested with the commanding officers. The Government did not intend to make any regulation founded on the recommendations of the Commissioners, but he trusted that those recommendations would be considered by the officers commanding corps, and that they would take every possible step to prevent the falling off of drill after Easter Monday. He had ground for hoping that greater attention would be paid to this matter, as under the new system proposed by the Commissioners, and to be adopted by Government, a stricter test of efficiency would be enforced, and it would be to the interest of officers and men to take those steps which were best calculated to ensure such efficiency.

LORD TRURO said, he fully concurred with the noble Earl who had just spoken. The recommendation of the Commissioners was founded on a misapprehension or forgetfulness of the other duties the men composing the various Volunteers Corps had to perform, and he was glad to hear that the Government and the War Office would not interfere with the arrangements of the Volunteer force. It was only on a few occasions, such as Easter Monday, that the men could all leave their other avocations for the purpose of taking part in the displays of field-days.

After a few words from Lord STRATHEDEN,

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, February 24, 1863.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Devises, Hon. William Wells Addington.

SELECT COMMITTEE.—On Private Bill Legislation, Mr. Haassard discharged; Mr. Hennessy, added.

SUPPLY.—Navy Estimates, Resolutions 1, 2, 3, reported.

PUBLIC BILLS.—First Reading.—Security from Violence [Bill 35]; Jurors' Remuneration [Bill 36]; Writs Prohibition [Bill 34]; Bills of Exchange and Notes (Metropolis) [Bill 33]; Marine Mutiny.

Second Reading.—Register of Voters [Bill 25]. Committee.—Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities [Bill 30].

Report.—Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities [Bill 30].

PRIVATE BILLS.—STANDING ORDER 120.

MR. MASSEY said, he rose to move that Standing Order 120, relating to private business, be repealed, and instead thereof the following be made a Standing Order of the House:—

"It shall be competent to the Committee on any Private Bill to admit the Petitioners, being the municipal or other authority having the local management of the Metropolis or of any town, or the Inhabitants of any town or district alleged to be injuriously affected by a Bill, to be heard against such Bill, if they shall think fit."

He made the Motion pursuant to a pledge he had given the House a few days ago, on the occasion of a discussion relating to the numerous railway and other Bills affecting the Metropolis, which would come before Parliament in the present Session. The main object of the proposed Standing Order was to give the Metropolitan Board of Works, as the most competent body to be intrusted with the office, a locus standi before the Committees on those Bills, with the view of protecting the interests of the public generally from being injuriously affected by those undertakings.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he wished to thank the hon. Member for Salford for having so promptly prepared the new Standing Order. He felt convinced it would be of the greatest value to the public, and especially to the inhabitants.

MR. LOCKE said, he wished to know whether it was intended by the proposed Standing Order that the municipality and "the inhabitants of any town or district" were to have co-ordinate powers to act under the circumstances referred to; because it might so happen, that notwithstanding the existence of the Metropolitan Board of Works, the interests of the public at large might be in danger of being sacrificed. As an illustration of his meaning, he would refer to the proceedings of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, who, it appeared, with the consent of the London Corporation, was about to construct one of those frightfully ugly viaducts across Ludgate Hill, and thereby to shut out the view of St. Paul's.

MR. COX expressed his approbation of the proposed alteration of the Standing Order.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that under the Order, as proposed, there was no doubt that the "inhabitants of any town or district" might be allowed to appear before a Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Standing Order 120, relating to private business, read, and repealed.

On the question that the Order proposed by Mr. MASSEY be a Standing Order of the House.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he wished to ask what was the object in using the expression "municipal or other" authorities?

MR. MASSEY explained, that the Metropolitan Board of Works, not being strictly a municipal authority, the words "or other" were necessary to include it within this Order.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered,

That it shall be competent to the Committee on any Private Bill to admit the Petitioners, being the municipal or other authority having the local management of the Metropolis or of any town, or the inhabitants of any town or district alleged to be injuriously affected by a Bill, to be heard against such Bill, if they shall think fit.

Ordered, That the said Order be a Standing Order of this House.

SIR GEORGE GREY reported Her Majesty's Answer to Address [13th February], as follows:—

I have received your Address, praying that I will give directions that no Sales to facilitate Enclosures be made of Crown Lands or Crown Forestal Rights within fifteen miles of the Metropolis.

The desire conveyed to me in this Address will receive due consideration.

Mr. Locke

NAVY—DOCKYARD PROMOTION. QUESTION.

MR. FERRAND said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Board intends to rescind the Regulation, bearing date the 16th day of October, 1861, relating to promotion in the Royal Dockyards? The Regulation in question prohibited all promotion in Her Majesty's Dockyards after the age of forty-five.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET:—In answer to the hon. Gentleman, I have to say, that there is no intention on the part of the Admiralty to rescind that Regulation.

ARMY ESTIMATES.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the numbers of the Foremen, Artificers, Workmen, &c. in the various manufactories of the War Department are not omitted in the Army Estimates for the year 1863-4; and, if so, whether the Secretary of State for War will take care that the omission be supplied in the same form as in the Army Estimates of 1862-3?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied, that the Army Estimates of this year had been prepared with considerable care, with the view of laying before the House all the information that was likely to be useful in debate. The details referred to by the hon. Baronet were advisedly omitted, for the reason that the artificers employed by the War Department were, for the most part, paid by the piece, and therefore any statement of the number of persons employed was necessarily founded upon vague and uncertain data. But if the hon. Gentleman wished for the number, he would take care that it should be laid upon the table.

EXPORTATION OF SALMON. QUESTION.

MR. TUCKER SMITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring in a Bill during the present Session to prevent the exportation of Salmon from the United Kingdom during the fence months of the year?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department intends to give notice that he will ask leave to introduce a Bill on the subject.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he rose to ask the hon. Member for Wexford a Question with reference to the postponement of the Fishery Bill, which stands for Committee on Wednesday next. When the Bill was read a second time, it was understood that the Committee should be postponed for a fortnight, and that fortnight would expire to-morrow. As the Government wished to propose some Amendments he wished to ask the hon. Member, If he would consent to a further postponement till to-morrow week?

MR. M'MAHON said, he yesterday refused to postpone the Bill when asked to do so for the convenience of Irish Members; but as he understood that the Bill was the only business on the Paper for the next day (Wednesday), and that if it were postponed the House would not meet, he would, therefore, consent to the postponement of the Committee.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, with reference to what has just fallen from the hon. Member for Wexford, I rather think there is no public business standing for to-morrow, and I am not aware that there is any private business of any importance. If that be so, perhaps when the House adjourns later in the evening, it may be for the convenience of the House that we adjourn till Thursday.

MR. HADFIELD: Is the House to sit on the 10th of March?

OUTDOOR RELIEF IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. LANIGAN said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he can inform the House why the Irish Poor Law Commissioners have not ordered outdoor relief to be given to distressed agricultural and other labourers, and to the unemployed and destitute mechanics in Ireland?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the hon. Member seemed to be under some misapprehension. According to the 1st section of the Act of 1847 it rested solely with the Guardians, and not with the Poor Law Commissioners, to give or withhold outdoor relief. There were three classes to whom outdoor relief would be given under that section of the Act by the Guardians, without any reference to the Poor Law Commissioners. First, destitute poor persons who were permanently disabled from labour by reason of old age, infirmity, or bodily or mental defect; secondly, to destitute poor persons, disabled from labour by reason of severe sickness or having met with serious accidents; and, thirdly, destitute poor widows, having two or more legitimate children depending on them for support. Therefore, the Poor Law Board had nothing to do with the matter, so far as the class to which the Question referred to was concerned.

EXTRADITION TREATY WITH ITALY.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any Treaty, Agreement, or Convention has been entered into with the Government of King Victor Emmanuel regarding the extradition of persons charged with having committed offences in Italy and resident at Malta; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay such Agreement, Convention, or Treaty upon the table, with the Correspondence relating to it; and, if not, whether any negotiation is going on between the two Governments for the purpose of concluding such an Agreement, Convention, or Treaty as above-mentioned for extradition, or whether such negotiation has been brought to a conclusion; and whether the Correspondence will be immediately, or when, laid upon the table.

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, that no Treaty or Convention, nor, indeed, in the strict sense of the word, Agreement, had been entered into by Her Majesty's Government with the King of Italy with regard to the extradition of offenders. What had taken place was this:—Some time ago the Italian Government proposed that this country should enter into an extradition treaty with them for the surrender of criminals who in large numbers had taken refuge in Malta. The British Government declined to enter into such Treaty, but suggested that they would do what was constantly done in the Colonies—namely, pass a local Ordinance for the surrender of certain criminals. This suggestion was accepted by the Italian Government. An Ordinance had been prepared and had been submitted to the Council of Malta. According to the law, before an Ordinance could be passed, it must be published in draft for a certain period in the Gazette of Malta. It had been so published, but had not yet passed the Council. When it had passed, it should, with all the correspondence, be laid on the table of the House. But he could assure the hon. and learned Baronet there was no reference in the Ordinance to political offenders.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that such an Ordinance has been proposed in the Council, that amendments have been moved, and that the Ordinance has been published in the newspaper?

MR. LAYARD: I have just stated that according to the law, the Ordinance must be published in draft before it can be passed. It has been so published, and when the requisite time has elapsed, it will then become law.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: That is not answering my Question, which is, whether the hon. Gentleman is aware that that Ordinance had been passed in the Council—that it had been previously debated by the Council, and afterwards published in the Gazette.

MR. LAYARD: I am not aware that it has passed.

MR. HENLEY: Does the word "criminal" include political offenders.

MR. LAYARD: I have stated that it does not include political offenders.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: May I ask whether that Ordinance is similar to the extradition clauses in the Treaties which have been entered into between this country and America and between this country and France; or whether that Ordinance includes a great number of offences besides those mentioned in the Treaties with America and France?

MR. LAYARD: The hon. and learned Gentleman did not give me notice of this part of the Question, and I cannot, therefore, give him an exact answer.

PRINCE OF WALES' MARRIAGE DAY.

QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD: I am afraid my Question did not reach the noble Lord at the Head of the Government, just now. The 10th of March is generally looked forward to as a general holiday, and I beg to ask, Whether the noble Lord intends that the House shall sit on that day?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Mr. Speaker, I imagine that you, Sir, will be in attendance elsewhere on that day, and therefore probably the House will not sit.

FRENCH MEDIATION BETWEEN THE FEDERAL AND CONFEDERATE STATES. QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, If there is any Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Emperor of the French relative to the offer of mediation between the Federal and Confederate States; and, if so, whether there will be any objection to lay it upon the table of the House; also, if Her Majesty's Government are aware that any reply on the subject has been received by the Emperor of the French from the Federal Government?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the only official document on the subject to which the hon. Gentleman's Question relates is the Despatch from Lord Russell of the 13th of November last to Lord Cowley, containing a reply to a verbal communication which had been received from the French Ambassador, and that Despatch is already on the table of the House. With regard to any later communication between the French Government and their Minister at Washington, and the answer which may have been given to it, I am sure the hon. Member must see that it is not convenient, if it were even possible, for Her Majesty's Government to give answers as to the communications between foreign Governments and their agents in foreign capitals.

QUESTION.

In answer to a Question from Mr. ROEBUCK.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he had no wish or intention to press the Bill on unduly. He desired to take with respect to it the course which was most convenient and most respectful to the Benchers. He thought it was arranged on the last occasion when the Bill was before the House that he should settle with the Solicitor General the time at which it should be brought forward again. He therefore proposed, after having conferred with him, to put down the second reading of the Bill for the day most convenient to the Penchens with reference to the matters they had under consideration.

APPROPRIATION BILL.—RESOLUTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER: Before I call upon the noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) to move the Resolutions of which he has given notice I wish to mention to the House that there is an objection in point of form to the Resolutions as they stand upon the paper. The noble Lord proposes to move two Resolutions, the second of which is as follows:—

“That the 26th Clause of the Appropriation Bill, which was first introduced into the Act of 1846, and which unsettles the appropriation of all the grants of the year for the Naval and Military Services, be expunged from the Appropriation Act.”

The House will at once see that it would be irregular to discuss the clauses of a Bill which has not yet been presented to the House. Again, as relates to the first Resolution—
